AUTHOR'S PREFACE

TO THE

Reader.o.lom

HIS Treatife prefents you with the Hiftory of three Wars sustained in France, in defence of the Reformed Churches
there; the accasion of the first was Bearne; that of the second, the not observing the Peace made at Montpellier; and that of the third, was the hope to fave Rochelle: But our sins fought against us; for instead of profiting, we were hardned by the chaft fements God fent us. In the two first Wars, the division: appeared but as scattered sparks, which in the last united to make a general constagration, there being no place, where Corruption had not Seated it self, and Avarice excluded Piety; sothat instead of expecting any overtures from our enemies, every one prostituted himself to sell his Religion, and betray his Countrey: Our Ancestours would have crushed such children intheir Cradles, had they thought they would have proved instruments of ruine to those Churches which they had planted in the mid st of Flames, and cherished in deflight of Torments; and who by their indefatigable pains, and perseverance, had left them possessors of a glorious Repose :

The Author's Preface to the Reader!

Repose: Nor will our Posterity easily believe themselves descended from such Noble Grandfathers, and such Infamous Fathers, if they look not higher, to wit, to God's who raises, and abates the Courages of men, according as his good pleasure is to discover his Wonders to his Church, in raising it from the dust; when the powers of the world conceive it buried there, and depressing it again, when Pride, and an Abuse of his Graces, are the only Product of them.

And here I feak to you Princes, and Common-wealths, whom God hath honoured with his Knowledge, blest with his Favours, advanced to the height of Dignity, and even satisted with Riches; take warning by us, and boast not your selves in the Arme of flesh, and the greatness of your Forces; in the height of your Prosperity beware a Fall; for then are you nearest danger: Many of you have with dry Eyes, and lethargique Arms, been Spectators of our Tragedy, without contributing any thing to our relief; and we our Selves, have Jeen the Ships, and Armies of others ingratefully promoting the ruine of those, who relieved them in their nesessity: God will not fail to do his work without you, when the time of our deliverance shall come; He is nearer to us in our Adversity, than you are to him in your Prosperity; if we are obliged to implore his Favour, you are much more to prevent his Judgments. Let the examples of others be your instruction, and while it is yet time, consider from what source your blessings flow, and give the honour and glory of it to him, towhom it is only due. In the mean time, prepare your selves to see here, without any disguise, the naked truth of what passed in our late trouble..

I have begun this History at the death of Henry the Great; for that during the minority of the King, his Son, the Maximes laid down by the Father, for the Government of France, were changed, and the foundation of the persecution of those of the Reformed Religion laid, which had like also to have proved the subversion of all Christendome, and given its Monarchy to the house of Austria.

I leave it to Posterity, to the end, that after my death, the truth of things which I have seen, may not be obscured, either by the Fables of Flatterers, or the Investives of our Persecutors: I have done it, without any the least Fistion, or Passion, and shall leave every man his liberty to judge of it, as he shall please.

DUKE of ROHAN:

OR,

A true Narration of the most remarkable Accidents in FRANCE,

From the death of Henry the Great, until the Peace made with those of the Reformed Churches there, in June 1629.

The first Book.

Containing the troubles during the minority of the King.

Frer the death of Henry the Great, every one began to think of his own affairs, the Queen to establish her authority, the chief Ministers of State to maintain their own, by advancing hers, as being the easest to be effected (by reason of the absence of the first Prince of the blood, the images and the misunderstanding that was be-becillity of the second, and the misunderstanding that was between the third and them: and the other great ones to raise themselves from that abject condition, the precedent raign had cast them into. Amid'st all which, hatreds were frequent, and the most subtle among them made use of the passion of others to ruine the authority of those that eclipsed theirs.

He that received the first shock, after the Regency was settled on the Queen, was the Duke of Sully, who by his fervices had acquired the honour of Principal Confident to the former King, and purchased the ill-will of most others: For a vertue, eminent, as was his, accompanied with the favour of his Master, is alwayes attended on by envie, a vice as frequent among men, as unworthy these who pretend any profession of honour. Many were very zealous for his ruine, and that for different reasons; The Chancellor Villeroy, and the President Janin, to confirm their own power in the government of the State, and take from among them a Man, whose exactnesse in the discharge of his Offices was their shame, so clear-sighted to discern, and so bold to discover their faults; The Count of Soiffons out of some particular hatred he bore him: The Marquesse d' Ancre for fear he should nip his budding fortune; and all the other Grandees, because they thought him too good a mannager of the Publick treasure; And the Prince of Conde when he came to the Court, by the instigation of the Marshal Bouillon, who bore him an inveterate malice, and drew on the Prince with hopes of confiscating his goods: A powerful motive to fet that Prince on work.

The chiefest means they used to remove him from the helme, were, to raise a jealousie in the Queen of the austerity of his humour, who opposed her in her liberalities; and to perswade her, that, having need of the Popes savour to strengthen her authority, she could not suffer one of the Reformed Religion, to have any hand in the Government of the State; Prevalent reasons with a Princess, who was a Forraigner little versed in State matters, reasons of her authority, and distrussful of all forts of people? But in the end experience discovered it to be the ruine of the State; For the Grandees grew up to a height that diminished the Royal power; the Treasuries were drained, the Arsenals strangely dispersed, and the comparison of that miserable condition of France with that shourishing one, the Duke of Sully left it in, clearly demonstrates, how highly prejudicial to the State, was his removal from his employments in it.

The Marshal Fouillon, a man of great courage and understanding, able to procure great good, and no lesse mischief to a Common-mealth, and who had been alwayes curbed by the late King, who was jealous of him, finding himself now at liberty, uses all manner of inventions, to make himself thought useful, and necesfary: The first was to endeavour whoily to possesse the spirit of the Prince of Conde, whose kinsiman he was, and to persuade him to become one of the Reformation, by that means to make himself the Chief, and Protector of a party, that was then very considerable; and with such industry carryed he on his Plots, that the Queen conceived great suspitions of him; and therefore to divert this blow, sought after him, who as soone as he had made his conditions with her, effaces the desires he had insused into the P. ince, to imitate the vertuous actions of his Ancestors; shewing him the thornes were in the way to honour, the perils, hardships and adverse accidents are met withal, in the pursuit of it; In short, the misery and poverty that accompany it, which proved most effectivall reasons to dissipate him from a designe so contrary to his nature.

The Duke of Roban in the mean time, who was Colonel of the Switzers, was commanded away to the fiege of Julliers, taking with him a Regiment of the Switzers, and having the command of the French Army in the absence of the Marshal de la Chastie, who was the Lieutenant General. At his return from this expedition, he finds how cruelly they oppresse his Father-in-Law the Duke of Sully; and that, after they had taken from him the Bistille, to dispose of the treasure in it, and his command of the Finances, to rob France with fuller liberty, they were now refolved upon his utter destruction, so to deprive him of all means to resent such indignities: But seeing that it was beyond their skill by any ordinary wayes to blemish the administration of any of his Offices, the Marshal Bouillon, who had infected the Prince of Conde, and the Count of Soiffons with the same malitious intention, contrived this defigne for his ruine, viz. to procure a General Assembly of those of the Religion, which was granted to be held at Chastelleraut on the five and twentieth of May, in the year 1611, in which he promifed himself power enough to cause the Duke of Sully to be entirely abandoned, fo that without any fear of those of the Religion, he might be arraigned before Commissioners impowered for his trial; and moreover, that by his industry he should so order the Assembly, and all the affairs of the Reformed party, that he should make himself the only man considerable: To bring this Project to passe, he vailes it with a pretence of much ass ation to those of the Reformation, and large promises of an Amelioration in their affairs; and communicates it to the Marshal de Lesdiguieres, and Du Plessis Mornay in particular, by Bellugeon an attendant of Lesdiguieres, who when he had been with them, returnes with these following Instructions from Du Plessis.

4 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book.I.

1. That the Provinces be exhorted to choose for Deputies, the best qualified and most sufficient persons.

2. That besides those, others of eminency among them, be also desired by letters to that purpose to be there.

 That the Deputies may have power to adhere to the plurality of voices, and that the Affembly be not diffolved, till they have received full fatisfaction.

4. That the demands of the Provinces be all founded expressly, or upon consequences deduced from the former Edicts and Concessions.

 Amongst others, that the Edict of Nantes be revived again, and observed as it was made with us, but since abridged in many things without us.

6. That our Grants for the places of security be made good to us, and the entire number of the Garrisons restored us, half of which have been wrested from us.

That the places we have loft, either by the Governors change of their Religion, or otherwise, be also given back to us.

8- That all the places of fecurity be continued to us for ten years at least, and that they be paid quarterly, fully, and upon the place; and that no mency be upon any pretence whatfoever, removed from the places of receipt, till the said quarter be satisfied.

 That it may regularly be obtained also, and had for provisions for vacant Governments, confidering the abuses which are, and may be there committed, to the prejudice of our safety.

10. That we may be permitted to repair and fortific all such places, as time has thrown into decay, and which for want of reparations will become wholly unuseful to us: And that complaint be made, that under pretence of these Governments, we are resused all other Offices and Dignities, contrary to the expresse Article of the Edict.

That no resignations of such places of security be allowed of without the consent of the Churches, which are therein most concerned: The like also for Presidents, and Counfellors of the Chambers.

12. That we may have free liberty as before, to compose, print, fell, and disperse all manner of books concerning our Do-

Strine.

13. That if there be any Town, whose place for the exercise of their Religion is too remote from it, the King be petitioned to grant one nearer, that being under the eye of the Magi-strates, they may be lesse subject to the insolency of the People.

14. That

Book I. The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan.

14. That the Article concerning burying-places, which makes way for so many Barbarisms, may be reformed.

15. That the Pensions allowed the Churches, considering the great number of them, may be augmented.

16. That the Jesuites may not have any residence in our places of fecurity.

17. That those Preachers and Friers, who teach, that all those who communicate with those of the Resormed Religion, or that serve and affist them, are damned, may be punished, as seditious disturbers of the publick peace, and infringers of the Edicts, by which their Majesties have published their intentions, to reunite the affections of their people.

18. That we may be allowed two Masters of request, to be paid by the King, for the first time, and one Notary in every Parliament, or at least in the places of security, and to be payed by us.

19. That some place of security be demanded, as well in the Provinces where there are none, as where there are many of the Religion. But that it be referred to the prudence of the Assembly, to consider how far this demand be pressed.

 That we may have a Grant for a General Affembly to be held every two years, for the renewing of our Deputies General.

21. That it be expressly specified, that we may have two Deputies General in Ordinary at Court at the Kings charges, but to be nominated by the Assembly.

22. That the Provincial Deputies may addresse themselves to the Deputies General without any previous applications to be made to the Governours of the Provinces.

These Instructions were sent abroad among the Provinces, where every one according to the extent of his power, and credit got them received, and resolved on. The aimes of these Gentlemen were diverse; that of Du Plesses was sincere, that of the Marshal Lesdiguieres (as the whole course of his life has discovered) tended only to his own interest; as also that of the Marshal Benillon, who made use of the power of others to convert all to his own advantage; For having filled the Provinces with hopes of bettering their condition, and made them enter into most strick resolutions for that end, discovers all at Court, shews them to Villerey, and to the Embassadors of England and Holland, to whom he also pretended much zeal for the Reformed Religion. And after this takes a journey to Sedan, that he might the better give the Court leisure.

to foster fears of the issue of this Assembly, and finde our meanes to render it ineffectual: His desires in this met a wished success; for at his return he treated fully with Villeroy, and having made his conditions for the Government of Poictou, worth three hundred thousand Livers, either for himself, or to be disposed of as he should order, and a hundred thousand Livers augmentation upon the Taxes of the common people, which by his appointment were d sposed to several particular persons: he promises to change all the resolutions of the Assembly, and give it such an issue, as should highly content the Queen; which he confirmed by an irrefiagable Testimony; for revisiting the aforesaid Embassadours, and particularly desens, he begins a discourse concerning those of the Reformation, quite contrary to his former before his Voyage to Sedan, viz That during the Kings Minority they were butter entertain a little patience, than thoughts of bettering their condition, and by that means justly purchase the Kings favour; that for his part he went to the Affembly with thoughts tending only to peace, and wholly bent to endeavour a submission of all to the pleasure of the Court. This much astonished Arsens, who conceived now that his composition was made, which he diffembled not at all to his friends: When he had made this progress, his favourites and creatures seconded it with discourses of the same nature, the better at a diffance to dispose the people to a compliance with his defires : And because Chastelleraut was within the Government of the Duke of Sully, whose ruine he thirsted after, he caused the Assembly to adjourn from thence to Saumure, the goverment of D# P'effis, that he might the more oblige him to a conjunction with him.

Before the Session of the Assembly, he informs Du Plessis by feveral persons of quality that he would not be President of it; that though they elected him, yet would he not accept of the charge, and that it was his defire, he should impart this his refolution to all he should see; for that he thought it very improper for any of the great ones to undertake it. This extreamely pleased them all, especially the Dukes of Rohan and Sully, who now cast their eyes upon Du Plessis, and assured him that they would carry it for him: But the Marshal Bouillon, coming the last of all, and after they had waited for him a day beyond the time prefixed, (though not without much murmurings, for that his mischievous designes began now to be discovered) visits Du Puffis, andtells him, that notwithstanding what had been said concerning the Prefidentship, he now defired their nomination, for that he knew the Duke of Sully had with much boasting threatened to prevent him of it; that it was a thing that his many fervices to the Party had merited of them; and that in case they refused him the honour, he would be gone the next morning: This change of his minde wrought no alteration at all in the resolutions of the Dukes, who found the greatest part of the Provinces disposed to their inclinations; so that whatever suit or parties the Marshal Bouillon could make, he had the voices but of fix Provinces, and Du Plessis of ten; who when he took his place, had Chamier a Minister, chosen for his assistant, and Desbordes Mercier for Secretary. This election so nettled De Boilillon, that returning to his Lodging he brake forth into words of difgust, and threats of vengeance against all those that had hindred him of the Presidentship; finding well by this Essay, that he was now like to faile of all he had promised himself from the Assembly: However, obliged both by prudence, and the importunate follicitations of those that were equally friends to them both, he reconciled himself to the Duke of Sully, whom he had before declared to be his greatest enemy.

The first thing the Assembly took into their consideration, was the disorder committed at Chastillon, contrary to the express Orders of the Marshal Bouillon and the Sieur Frere Commissioners appointed by the King for that particular assaire, for which the Marshal pretended so high a displeasure, that having dispatched thither Beauchamp, one of his Gentlemen, to enquire into the truth of the matter, he declared as his opinion, that it was sit the Assembly should choose Senas for their Deputy, to be sent to the Court with full instructions, and a strict charge to declare, That they would not treat of any thing with the Kings Commissioners, before reparation were made for that wrong: But that violent heat quickly abated; for he presently excused himself from medling any surther in it, because his Commission was expired.

After this the Kings Commissioners had audience, who in all their discourses pretended, that the preservation of those of the Reformed Religion was involved with, and necessary to that of the State, assuring them of their Majestics savour, that they would gracions receive all their Remonstrances and Petitions, cause their Edicts and Concessions to be observed, put those that had hitherto been neglected, in execution; and interpret to their advantage, what was obscure in them. And lastly, That they less it to the choice of the Assembly, either to put their Papers into their hands, or send them to the Court, protesting, that which way soever they took, they should have a quick and savourable dispatch.

From these fair premises sprung no less fair hopes; and according

The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book I. cording to the instructions of the Provinces, were their papers Prepared; the Marshal Bouillon not opposing one Article, having been the Author of those Propositions, which were put into the hands of Lusignan, Aubigny, and the other Deputies to exhibite the principal points of them to the Kings Commissioners, who, after some debate declared, that they had not power to determine anything concerning them: But going to the Affembly, advised them to make their addresses by Deputies to the King, to whom they would do them all good Offices; which was concluded on. At the election of the Deputies, there happened a great stirre, occasioned by the opposition of contrary factions, which made the Assembly resolve not to draw up their Instructions and Commissions, before their nomination; that so they might either inlarge or restraine them according to the conditions of the persons chosen, who were La Case, Courtaumer, Ferrier the Minister, Mirande and Armet, who had no power to conclude any thing, but only to debate the propositions; and having explained them, to give an account of all to the Assembly, who would return them their resolutions thereupon: This restriction pleased not all the ved, that his design was broken. While they were preparing their papers, there fell out two particular things worthy the observing. The first was on the several oppositions the Marshal Bowllon made to an Article, which the Duke of Sully as earnestly pressed, viz. That the Assembly should interess themselves in his cause, for that they endeavoured to deprive him of his offices for no other cause, but of his Religion, in which the Marshal proceeded so faire, as an attempt to ma' e the son renounce his Obligations to his Father-in-law, which he violently purfued; especially one time going to visit him being fick, telling him that it was impossible, but that in the administration of those great charges he had borne, especially in that of the Finances, when he was Comptroler of the Exchequer, there should be found some faults committed; though not by him, yet by his Officers and Servants; and that if the King should issue out a Commission to examine his actions, neither the Assembly, nor any other of the Reformed Religion ought to be offended at it; no, though the Commissioners should do him wrong, since it would be by the ordinary wayes of Justice that he received it, and that he thought the Duke of Robin so honest a mana true French man, and so great a friend to peace, that he would be nothing This speech was but ill-received, and no better anmoved at it. fwered by the Duke, who told him, that the Duke of Sully's impertant services deserved a better recompences than to be exposed, Book I. The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan.

as a prey to those that had differved the State; that his actions in discharge of his Offices, free from all corruption, and misdemeanour, could not, by reason of his qualitie, be inquired into, but by a Court of Peers; and that if he were otherwise dealt withal, all his kindred, and especially he, his son in Law, with all their friends, would engage in his cause; so that after several Sels fions, the Assembly proceeding to a determination of that Article, so much urged by the Provinces also, advised the Duke of Sully not to accept of money in lieu of his Offices, and especially, not to quit that of Grand Master of the Artillery, promising withal, that if for that end they should use any undue, unlawful, and extraordinary procedures against him, they would publickly Declare that they looked on the Duke of Sully's, as the same with the general interest of the Churches, and of Justice; and that therefore they were resolved by all just and lawful means to assist him: And of this the Deputies general had an express charge given them in their instructions.

The other was concerning Berticheres, one of the Deputies for the lower Languedoc, a Gentleman of quality, and of good parts, who in the raign of the late King, who was displeased at him, by reason of his practices, and intelligence with the Constable Montmorency Governour of that Province, was somewhat unhandsomely turn'd out of his governments of Sommieres, and Aiguemoites; to which having in vaine fought to be restored, he conceived this a favourable opportunity to make the Affembly embrace his cause, for that they were both places of security; and, though they were in the hands of Gentlemen of the same Religion, yet he presumed they were persons, that had not given so great Testimonics of their zeale for the good of the Churches, as he had done; and that though he had been constrained to accept of a recompence for his Command, yet was it only for that of Sommiers; but for dignemortes he never received any thing; and that fince his fervices to their party had drawn upon him this prejudice, it was but reason that they should own the Justice of his Cause: And forasmuch as he had brought with him Writings to verific what he alledged, he moved the Assembly to appoint Commissioners to examine them, and make their report to them, that they might consider of them.

It is no be observed that this Berticheres made a great profession of friendship to the Duke of Sully, who had done him many good Offices to the late King, so that he desired some of his chiefest friends for Commissioners, who made so favourable a report of his business to the Assembly, that in spight of the opposition made by the Duke of Bouillen, who stood for Arembures, to whom

10 The Alemoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book I.

The Government of Aiguemortes was given, it was so well received by the Assembly, that the Deputies residing at the Court, were commanded to use all diligence in his behalf, it being a thing of general concernment, and of great consequence. When he had abtained this, he goes to the Court, where he steers a new course, and to arrive at his aimes, promises most powerfully to assist the Court-party, upheld by the Duke of Boillon, in the Assembly, and by this means got a quick and satisfactory dispatch for his re-entry into Aiguemories: Moreover in this journey he made the Constable his friend, who embraced his cause with the same servour, as if it had been his own proper concernment, and then returned to the Assembly: The issue of this assair shall be seen in its proper place:

But let us now return to the general affairs.

When the Deputies of the Affembly were come to the Court, their first disparch thence brought news of their fair reception, especially by the Queen, (who commanded them to put their papers into the hands of Boissife, and Bullion, Counsellors of State) and of the favourable answers they had at several audiences receiwed from the Council: But this was foon clouded by another meffage from them quite contrary to the former, which informed the Assembly, that the promise to have their Propositions answered, and returned into their hands, was now interpreted to be after the nomination of the Deputies general, and diffolution of the Affembly: This highly displeased them who had already di vulged among the Provinces, the good hopes they conceived from the first intelligence the Deputies gave them: But, forasmuch as it was a thing contrary to the use and custome of the Kings Council, in affaires of all forts to fend back the Deputies unanswered; and that in all their discourses with them there was no mention of any fuch conditions, the Affembly unanimously resolve not to dissolve before they had received an answer to their Articles; which the Murshal Boilillon seem'd to approve of, and promised his utmost assistance to procure them a handsome returne concerning it.

But there was a great difference between the Letter, he shewed the Assembly, and that which he sent away, which intimated his opinion, that theast some of them should see the answers to their Propositions before their dissolution: But the assiduous endeavors of the Deputies proving inestectual, they returned to Saumure, where Ferrier in the name of all the rest, made a relation of the particulars of their whole voyage, by which they perceived that Bullion was coming after with their Propositions answered; but that before his arrival their Majesties desired the Deputies general anight be nominated; which notwithstanding was suscended.

When

When Bullion came, he confirmed what the Deputies had reported, protested to many upon his damnation, that the Propositions were most favourably answered; terrifies some with threats, whiles he fills others with hopes; and to encrease both their feares, and hopes, he shows the Patents he brought with him for the augmenting the pensions of Parabere, and others, and the Orders to cancel those of the Dukes of Roban and Soubize. The Marshal Boulllon for his part, employes all his Art to winne the Deputies of the Affembly by hopes of a general deputation, and by the power he had to dispose of the Tax imposed upon the common people now raised to an hundred thousand Livers more, the better to enable him to corrupt more men: The resolution also of the Assembly to send new petitions to their Majesties, that they might receive their answers before they diffolved, gave him an opportunity to play the notable Polititian: For though there was a very good understanding between the Marshal Bouillon and Bullion, yet pretended they a difference in their opinions; the one affuring them, that it would be but loft labour to importune the Court any more; the other encouraging them to it with promifes of good successe; but his chief defign was to weary some with delayes, that he might have the better opportunity to draw others to his party; and in the mean time covered all his projects with a pretence of zeale, that the simpler fort having less suspicion of him, might the more easily be intrapped: But failing in this attempt, he resolved with Bullion and his friends, to perswade their Majesties to write a letter (of which he fent them a draught) peremptorily commanding the Affembly to diffolve, revoking the Licence granted for their meeting, and declaring null all their past or future Acts: And forasmuch as their Majesties were informed, that all the Deputies did not agree in this obstinacy and disobedience, they commanded those Deputies that would obey to proceed among themfelves to the election of fix Deputies, who should receive from the hands of Bullion the propositions with their answers; which Lerter was to be brought by one, that knew well enough how to play his Game. Bellugeon the Marshal Lesdiguieres his Agent, was made choice of for this employment, a fit Instrument to execute fuch a Commission, being a crafty fellow, void both of honor and honesty, whose subtle pate was alwayes busied about things conducing only to his own advantage.

Before he began this goodly journey, he takes his leave of the Assembly, faisly pretending, it was only to see his friends and kinred in Berry, and then goes out of the Town upon an ordinary Hackny, but soon after takes post: which being certified to the Assembly, as also his treacherous practices at Paris, together 12 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. with the calumnies he aspersed the Duke of Rohan, and his friends withal, he was by them declared unworthy to be re-admitted to this, and for the future to any other Assembly: But forasmuch as he had the honour of being a servant to the Marshal Lesdiguieres, they referred his fu ther doom to him. This censure infinitely vexed the Marshal Bouillon, who employed all the power he had to get it revoked, declaring that it was by his command that he had undertaken this journey, but all in vain; which so incensed him against the Duke of Rohan, that they forbore to speak one to the other for a long time after. It was not long before the effects of this voyage were feen; for the Letter for their dissolution contrived at Saumure, but dispatched from the Court, came, and soon after Bellugeon, who declared that they should now receive full satisfaction: But when the Marshal Bouillon went up to the Castle, and shewed the Letter to Du Plessis, and La Force, endeavouring to gain their approbation of it, and the contents of it were fully understood by them, then were they filled with amazement and displeasure; which Bouillon perceiving, he thought it convenient that Du Plessis should impart the substance of it, to such of the Assembly as he thought fit, that together they might contrive some means to compose all differences. Bullion also promises to deferre the delivery of the Letter, out of a feeming defire to feek out some way for an accomodation; and to that end defires a conference with Du Plessis, which being yielded unto, after some discourse, they agreed that in case they should proceed to a nomination of fix Deputies, and rest satisfied with the answers were given them, he (although he had no Commission for it) should undertake to procure them fatisfaction from their Majesties upon the source or five principal Articles, as, concerning the Chamber of Edicts at Paris, Provision for Vacant places, the payment of the remaining part of Nine score thousand Crowns, and the restoring of those places of security were taken from us; and all this to be done before the diffolution of the Assembly; to which as Du Plessis was ready to make his report of this conference, Bullion fent him word, that he was informed, and that by very good intelligence, that there were some, who intended to take advantage of his discourses the day before; wherefore he retracted them, and desired he might be permitred to go into the Affembly to have the Queenes Letter read, and discharge his duty to the Commands he had received from Her.

This sudden change clearly discovered, that the end of this conference was only to amuse the honest party in the Assembly, the better to surprize them before any thing was agreed on, or that they

they were prepared for what they were to do, either in order to their dissolution, or the Deputation, and cheat them of the thanks and benefit of their pairs: But both Evillon and Bullion too, were not a little dismayed when they saw, that when upon the reading of the Letter Berticheres rose up, and said, That for his part, he would obe y, and that it was fit that those that were of his opinion should likewise declare themselves; all of them with one voice cryed out, that they were more resolved upon obedience than he, but that the businesse should be further discussed, when the Commissioner was withdrawn, which was accordingly done.

But here it is to be observed, that notice being taken of the confultations which were commonly held night and day in the Marshal Bouillon's Lodgings, by five and twenty of the Assembly (which were all he could draw to a confederacy with him) where Bullion also was often present, the rest of the Assembly, to the number of fifty, with one consent conceived it fitter to yield to the necessity of the times, than to make a division, which would inevitably force them to accept for Deputies general persons wholly devoted to the Court sastion, and that they were better seek our

some other way to redress their evils.

The Marshal Bouilton perceiving that the resolutions taken up by his Antagonists, had frustrated his hopes of procuring some creatures of his own to be chosen Deputies general, makes his applications by Proxy, to the Duke of Rohan, for his confent to the restoring agains of Bellugeon, and sharing the Deputation general between them two: In which the Duke of Sully also interessed himself, and so farre prevailed with the Duke of Rohan, that he caused an interview between them at his Lodgings, where the Marshal entreated him to abate his rigour towards Bellugeen, which he promised him to do: But as for sharing the Deputation, he was so averse from the very mention of it, that at the meeting on the day appointed for their election, the Duke of Sully openly blamed him for his obstinacy, telling him that he would ruine all by his wilfulness: But the issue discovered the contrary: For having affured himself of ten Provinces, he makes them agree to elest the fix Deputies that should be nominated by the Ministers of those provinces; which succeeded according as he had designed it; for not one of those the Marshal would have promoted (to his extream discontent) were so much as named. Those that were chosen, were Montbrun, Bertheville, and Rouvray for the Nobility; and Maziald, Boiffeul, and Milletiere, for the Communalty: As for Bellugeon, though the Duke of Roban no more opposed him, yet was there much difficulty to revoke his censure; ma14 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. ny times was it debated; at length, when a good part of the Affembly were risen, those that remained, razed it out of their Records: The Regulations for the Assembly were signed also, but the Marshal entred a Protestation under his hand and seal not to acknowledge the Ministers for a third estate, or order.

And hence sprang the Original of all our mischiefs and divisions; For the Marshal takes his journey to the Court, to receive a recompence for his fervices, and revenge himself upon all those that had opposed his designs, principally the Duke of Rohan, who feared him least, and had withstood him most of any; wherefore he layes a plot to out him of his Town of Saint John d' Angely, of which he was Governour, and place therein La Roche-beaucourt the King's Lieutenant in his roome, alledging, that if he were once deprived of that retreat, he would be unable to attempt any thing: On the other fide, the Duke of Rohan, and his brother, at a Confultation held at Saumure before their departure thence, with those that were of their opinion, concluded that every one of them should give their respective Provinces an account of what had passed, and instigate them by particular Deputies to the Court, to make new Remonstrances of their aggrievances, which they so happily performed, that in spight of the contradictions of the Commissioners appointed for the execution of the Edict, the years following there came to Paris Deputies from twelve Provinces.

In the mean while the Duke of Roban goes to divert himself at his houses in Britany, and so to the Assembly of Estates of that Province; At his return from thence he was informed of the conspiracies laid at Saint Johns in prejudice of his authority; to discover which, and also to apply convenient preventions, he sends thither Haulte Fontaine, from whom receiving advice of the necessity of his presence, he hasts thither with all speed, and as he passed through Poiston, gave his friends intelligence of all, and sent Loudriere to Rochel.

His unexpected arrival much daunted his enemies, who neverthelesse sent for Roch-beaucourt to come speedily to their relief; but the Duke of Rohan's friends, slocking in every moment, grew to such a number, as that Roche-beaucourt durst not stir, but contented himself with giving the Court an account of what passed a Upon which information the King dispatches away La Fentaine to the Duke, in appearance to know what was the matter, but in effect to consirm by letters, and encourage the Partisans of Rochebeaucourt, which the Duke, having treated him nobly, learnt out of La Fontaine, whom he returned with a faithful promise to wait upon their Majesties, with a free account of all his actions, upon their first commands, which within a few dayes after he received;

And presently sets forward to the Court, taking with him, among others, Roche-beaucourt, and Faucault, whom he greatly suspected; and leaving in Saint John Haulte Fontaine with all necessary Orders and Instructions, that at his return, he might not finde his own gates shut against him. Being arrived at Court, he shewed the Oueen by several instances, that he had behaved himself like an honest man at the Assembly of Saumure, and that he had opposed the Marshal Bouillon, for that he knew, that he took part with those of the Reformed Religion, for no other end, but to advance his own Interests, and render himself more considerable both of the one fide, and the other, and that had he compassed his defignes, she would have been the first would have felt the effects of his arrogance: But there were no eares open to his justification, (it being the constant humour of Princes not easily to be reasoned out of opinions, they have been prepoffessed withal) so that sceing the time for the Election of a new Major for the Town of Saint Fohn drew near, and that his abode at Court was to no purpose, he pretended that his brother was fick, upon which having got leave to be gone, he took post that very night; which fell out well for him; For the Marshal Boilillon having notice the next day of his departure, was very earnest to have him pursued, and brought back again; but he made such haste, as it was impossible to overtake him.

As he passed by Parc in the lower Poicton, he tock Soubize along with him, advertised his friends in Poicton of what had happened, and went to Saint John, whither Foncault, a Captain of the Garrison, whom he had taken with him to Paris, being sent away from the Court, was come before him, and had secretly assembled the Major and some others of that Cabel, to out the Duke of the Government, and for that end effered them two thousand men; which the Duke having notice of, presently upon his arrival at Saint John, he commanded Foncault, who was then about three or sour leagues thence, to return thicher no more, and at the same instant sent away Tenis to their Majesties, to informe them of the just cause he had, not to allow the said Foncault any more accesse to Saint Fohn.

The time for the Election of the Major being at hand, which is alwayes the Sunday before Palme Sunday, comes Claverie from the Court with an express, which signified, that by reason of the divisions of the Town, it was the Kings pleasure, for the repose of it, and the avoiding of sactions there, that the old Major should be continued, and that this precedent should not for the siture any way impair the Priviledges of the Town; whereupon the Duke of Ruhan remonstrates to his Majesty, how that he was mis-informed of the condition of the Town, and of what consequence it was, both to his service, and the publick peace, that, according to their ancient custome, they should proceed to Election of a new Major, hoping that this would be affented to, and for that reason sent this

Secretary with this letter to the Court.

Now the Marshall Bouillon rightly imagining, that the Duke of Roban would oppose the continuation of the old Major, as a thing highly prejudicial to him, engaged the Royal authority in it to the uttermost, that so he might either ruine him by his voluntary submission, or by obliging the King to force him to a complyance; So that two dayes after the arrival of Claverie comes Saint More, a younger brother of Montaugier, and brother in law to Roch-beaucourt with another, and stricter expresse to the same purpose: But the Duke of Roban knowing, that his own ruine would affuredly be the consequence of the losse of Saint John, conceived it least dangerous for him to secure the Town, and seared not to refuse all those Orders as prejudicial to the King's service, and to proceed to the Election of a new Major, according to the usual custome of the Town, out of three of the Corporation, whose names were fent by Deputies, constituted for that purpose, to his Majesty, to make choice of which of them he pleased; and for the security of the place, the Keyswere, in the interim, put into the hands of the first Alderman.

The report of these things caused a great buffle at Court; Tenis, and Onglepied, whom the Duke some few dayes before, had sent thither, were committed prisoners to the Bastille; his mother, wife, and fifters were forbid to go out of Paris; and Propositions were also made of drawing down an Army to besiege him; On the otherfide the Duke, well knowing the power of his enemies at Court, and that he was to expect a violent persecution from them, took great care to make all those of the Reformed Religion in France sensible, that the harred conceived against him, was occafioned only by the resolution and constancy he had shewed to the good of their affairs; that his, and the losse of St. Fobn, would draw after them their destruction also; that if their adversaries found this easily accomplishable, they would not stop their course in so fair aroade; and then prepares himself the best he could to make a brave resistance. But at length when all things were more maturely deliberated, the King's Council thought fitter to commit this bufinesse to a Treaty, and Themines was sent to the Duke to determinate the difference in a peaceable way: The result of his negotiation was, That, for eight dayes the Keyes of the Town should be left in the hands of the old Major, that they should proceed to the nomination of three, out of which the King should make choice of one; and, that after this Election Roche-beaucoure and Foucault should be permitted to return again to execute their charges, provided, notwithstanding that the latter should presently quit rhe Town again.

Themines fent this agreement to the Court, where at first it was well enough liked of; but when it was communicated to, and scanned by the Dukes enemies, it could by no means be approved of: But Themines had orders fent him, to infift upon the return of Roche-beaucourt and Foucault, before the new Election, which the Duke of Rohan consented to; and thus, for the present, was mitigated the heat of this affair, though the persecutions against the Duke of Rohan and his party continued in their former violence; especially at Court, where the Marshal Bouillon endeavoured, first to corrupt the Deputies, then to make divisions among them; and last of all to destroy their authority: And when the Provinces sent their Deputies to the Court to remonstrate their resentments of the ill impressions were given their Majesties of their loyalty, to vindicate themselves from the calumnies vented against them, and to obtain a grant of all their just demands, so necessary to their subsistence: The Marshal Bouillon perceiving, that neither his confederacies in the Provinces, nor the Commissioners purposely sent in to them, could hinder the deputations, turns now his whole endeavours to render their Negotiation fruitlesse, alledging, that it was a diminution of the Kings authority to give audience to an Assembly convened against his will; that, if their requests were yeilded to, and satisfaction given them that way, it would disgust the loyal part of his subjects, and reunite the now disjoyned Provinces with the Complainants; and openly discovering also great displeasure, that they should repay all his fervices with flights, and envie; imputing unto him, upon all occasions, what ever mischief befel them: So that, though he could not prevent their audience, he frustrated the contentment they hoped thence, telling the Deputies general freely, that what he did, was in tevenge of the affronts he received from the Assembly at Saumure.

These things passing thus, the Marshal Bovillon continues his ill offices to the interests of those of the Reformed Religion in general, and those of the Duke of Roban in particular; and having obtained the Ambassadorship extraordinary for England to get the alliance with Spaine approved of there, feeds himself also with hopes by the means of that imployment, there to procure a dislike of the actions of the Assembly of Saumure: Eur the Duke of Roban sound an opportunity, by a Gentleman that attended on the Marshal in the voyage, to give the King of England a true information of all things; so that as to that particular, the answer

he received, was, that if the Queen should be induced to infringe the Edicts made in favour of those of the Reformed Religion, so that it were manifest, that they were persecuted for their Religions fake; his Majesty required, in that case, that neither the League lately made with France, nor his present confirmation of the same, should be understood to their prejudice: For Nature teaches every one, when he fees his neighbour affaulted for a quarrel which relates to himself, to foresee what he may expect from the issue of it. As for his part, the King of England exhorted the Marshal to a reconciliation with the Duke of Rohan, to whom also he intimated his pleasure in that particular: In reference to which, the National Synod then held at Privas, endeavoured it also, and for that end, besides the Deputies general, chose Du Moulin, and Durand, Ministers, and L'isle-gro lot an Elder, whose care and pains in it were so effectual, that the sixteenth of August, in the year 1612. the Marshals Bouillon, and Lesdeguieres signed these ensuing Articles, viz. That they would hearken to a fincere reunion, promising to Submit their own particular interests to the common welfare of those of the Reformed Religion, by an Oblivion of all past injuries: That they would freely renounce all resentments, and animosities against any persons, and for what cause soever: That they would love and honour every one according to his ranke and quality, giving them upon all occasions, all testimonies of friendthip, as far as the duty of true Christians, and faithful Subjects of the King should oblige and permit them. They farther also protested, that they desired nothing more, than by a firm Union and concord to see the Kingdom of God advanced, and the Churches flourish in a happy peace, under the obedience of his Majesty; and, moreover, to imploy all their power, that the authority of the Synods be not invalidated, nor the Discipline infringed; and that they would not favour, nor any wayes afaft any particular persons or Churches, that by unjust or prejudicial means should separate from the Union, and conformity to the Destrine and Discipline received in the Churches. This Prorestation was also signed by the Dukes of Rohan, Sully, and Soubize, La Force, and Du Plessis; to which they defired might be added these following Articles; vz. To cause this Att to be signed by the Governours of all places of security, and other persons of confideration in the Provinces, and that by the way of Conference; and, that a Clause might be inserted, by which they should oblige themselves to observe, as well all Politique, as Ecclesiastical order, and to restore and confirm the authority of the Deputies general in their charges.

But for all these goodly appearances, the persecutions against those of the Religion, and the Duke of Rohan, ceased not; which enforced them at last, upon the grievances of the Province of Kaintonge to call an Assembly of five Provinces, according to the regulation of the Assembly of Saumure.

Whiles these things were a doing, there hapned a new accident, which hastned the Assembly: Berticheres, supported with the power of the Constable, the Decree of the Assembly of Saumure, and the favor of the Court, would needs repossesse his government of Aignemortes: But the Province, advertised of his demeanour by Saugeon (whom the Duke had fent thither purposely with a character of him) fo ordered that affair, that, in spight of the Constable, they mainrained Arembures in it, and kept Berticheres out; which so incenfed him, that he made Saugeon a prisoner at Ville-franck in Rollergue, which was more than he could do in his own government. When the Duke of Rohan, and the Province of Xaintonge heard this, they avowed the voyage, and owned the cause of Sangeon; The Assembly also met at Rochel, notwithstanding the ill usage, and traverses occasioned them by the Marshal Boilillon, who showed himself more their enemy, than all the Kings Council beside (notwithstanding his engagement passed to the King of England, and the Deputies of the National Synod) and instigated the Clergy of France to go to the Quetn, and hinder her giving any favourable answers to those of the Religion, supposing that such rigor would force them upon extremities, & would make them appear guilty of a desire of war, and give him an occasion to interpose as a mediator for them at Court; that so, he might render himself useful to both parties, and whatever happened, still make up his own reckoning.

On the other side, Du Pless tired with these persecutions, from which he himself was not exempted, and fearing what the iffue of these disturbances would be, interposes for the composing of them, and comes to Rochel accompanied with Rouvray, one of the Deputies general, and brother to his fon in law, bringing with him a draught of some Articles, not signed : But the successe of his negotiation, not answering his expectation, he withdrew again, and with him, the Province of Anjou, (one of the five affembled) Neverthelesse, the other four continued well united, and by Messengers, defired the Duke of Rohan's presence at Rochel, to consult with them about what was to be done: When he came, it was refolved, that they should send a Gentleman to the Queen, in the name of the Provinces, to accept, for the present, the offers had been made them, referring the pursuance of the rest to the Deputies general. But hearing, in the mean time, of the commotions at the Court, of a bold action committed in the affassination of

The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book. I. the Baron de Luz, to the great displeasure of the Queen, and the Baron de Luz, to the great displeasure of the Queen, and violation of her authority; the Assembly took the boldnesse to send Le Parc, a' Archiat, and Cressoniere to their Majesties, with protestations of their loyalty, and offers of their service, choosing rather to submit to their pleasures in accepting the offers made them, than to augment the present troubles by their importunities: Bessar also made a Speech to the same effect, in the behalf of the Duke of Roban; and all were well received at Court: Thus ended this Assembly, which though continually traversed, as is before related, brought more benefit to the Publick, and comfort to the Duke of Roban, than that of Saumare.

The Articles agreed on (and pretty well observed) were,

 That the King's Atturneys should have Orders to receive the Attestations of the Ministers, without compelling them to add the Epithet, Pretended, to the Reformed Religion.

2 That the Ecclefiastical persons should be permitted the enjoyment of the same liberty, they had in the raign of the late

King.

3. That they have a Toleration of Provincial Councils, for the ordering of their Politick affairs, as in the late Kings time.

4. That the Ministers, as well as other Ecclesiastical persons in France, may be exempted from the payment of all Taxes and Subsidies, and that all necessary provisions to this effect, be given them.

5. That all the Edicts be published anew, together with a Declaration, confirming all Grants, Favours, and Concessions of the late King, with an Act of Oblivion, and a Decree, that all proceedings commenced against those of the Reformed Religion become null, and as if they had never been.

5. That the Inhabitants of Rochel be permitted to enquire into the occasion of what hapned at Couldray; and be also freed from the jealousies they may justly derive from the two near approach of the Ships, and that, to that end, they be commanded to ride farther from the shore.

 That the Remonstrances of the lower Languedoc be received concerning Aiguemortes; that provision be made for it; and that, in the mean time, the place be committed to the care of Chastillon.

 That the razing of Vefferes be suspended, and the Remonstrances of the Province of Languedoc, concerning that partisular, be received.

9. That

 That nothing be changed in the Mas d'Agenois in the lower Guienne, and that La Vessiere be replaced there.

10. That the Count of Panias be defired by letter, to continue the Captain Pre in his command under him, in Mansiete.

11. That the troops which are in Xaintonge, Poitson, and the places adjacent, be removed.

12. That Roche-beaucourt, and Foucault, be sent out of Saine

Fohn.

13. That the one of their Companies shall be given to the Duke of Rohan, and the other to the King's Lieutenant, which shall be placed there, in the place of La Roche-beaucourt, but with the approbation and good-liking of the Duke of Rohan.

14. That the Office of Serjeant Major of the place becoming void, either by death, or demission of the Officer, it shall be fupplyed as the Duke shall please.

15. That the pensions of the Dukes of Rohan, and Soubize, shall be paid, both the arreares, and what shall for the future accrue.

16. That no violence be done to the friends or fervants of the Duke of Rohan; that those that had pensions shall receive them, as before the Assembly of Saumure; and that no injury be done to the Baron de Saugeon, but that he be restored to his liberty.

Whiles the Court raifed these tempests in the Provinces, it felf was not free from commotions. The Marshal d' Ancre, who had ingroffed the whole favour of the Queen, bred, and cherished divisions among the great ones, lest their union should obstruct his advancement; so equally ballancing all parties, that neither could over-poise the other, and continually fomenting envie and jealouses among them, lest their reconciliation should prove his ruine : They on the other fide suffering themselves to be hurried on by the violence of passion, rather than led by the calmer conduct of reason, so that all the Princes of the blood were seen in opposition one against the other, and those also of the house of Lorraine, according as their present enjoyments, or hopes of future favour moved them: But at length the Prince of Conde upon the Queens refusal to give him Chasteau Trompette, raised a party of discontents, under pretence of reforming the diforders in the government of the State; The Marshal Bouillon the main contriver of this Party, managed it with such artifice, that he caused the Prince, the Dukes of Longueville, Nevers, Maine, and others, to absent themselves from the Court, whom he himself followed the last of all, and with the Queens confent too, upon the hopes he had given her .

her of reducing all those Princes; And with such dexterity hand dled he the affair, that he became both the Author and composer of it; in which there was one very remarkable thing to be taken notice of, which was, that he imparted the whole businesse to the knowledge of the Duke of Roban's most faithful friends, and concealed it from his own, whom in other things he had alwayes trusted; for that he very well knew the corruption and falshood of the one, and the integrity and sidelity of the other.

The Prince with his Partifans retired to Mexieres, a Town belonging to the Duke of Nevers, near Sedan; The Duke of Maine who was Governour of the Isle of France, with the Towns of Soisfors, Noyons, and the Castle of Pierresons; the Marquesse de Ceuters with Laon; all very considerable places, together with the Duke of Longveville, Governour of Picardy, with all the friends and servants they could muster in their governments joyning to the frontiers of Germany, and Flanders, with the rest of the discontents in France, made up a very formidable party; to which I shall not adde, that upon the retaining of these Male-contents from the Court, the Duke of Vendosme being apprehended in the Louvre, and there detained prisoner; a few dayes after made his escape, and got into Britany his own government, where he made great preparations also.

Things being in this condition, the Prince writes a letter to the Queer, whose contents were nothing but complaints of the diforders committed in the State under her authority; that the Princes of the blood, Dukes, Peers, and Officers of the Crown were excluded from the Publick affairs, which were managed by three or four only, who to maintain their own height, fowed divisions among the Nobility, lavishing the treasures, and at their pleafure, disposing of them, the Arsinals and Frontire Garrisons, which were intrusted in the hands of strangers, who were in no wife responsible for them; that they defired an Assembly of the States General, according to the Custome, during the Minorities of their Kings, in which the Queen should finde a legal provision made for the support of her authority, the preservation of the Lawes, and reforming all abuses that obstructed the admininstration of them. He writes also to the Parliament of Paris, and all the Grandees not yet confederated with him, to invite them to a Conjunction with his Party; and to the Deputies general also, telling them that those of the Religion were not forgotten in his Remonstrances; He sent also Le Maretz Lieutenant of his guards, to the Duke of Roban to court him to arme in his behalf, protesting that he would not liften to any agreement, but with his consent: But the Dake who on the one fide knew very well the credit the Marshall Bou. Wers

Bowillon had gained among his most intimate confidents; and on the other, remembring the continual ill offices he had received from him ever fince the Assembly of Saumure; and being not un-Jealous that the war was only declared in words, whil'st in truth they were already entred inro a Treaty, resolved to send Haultfontaine, in whom he reposed great confidence, along with Maietz to make a discovery of the true posture of the Prince his affairs: and in the interim made his addresses by letter to the Queen, asfuring her, that he would continue united with the whole body of those of the Religion, to whom if she pleased to vouchsafe some satisfaction, she should reclaime her discontents at an easie

In the mean while the Prince came to Saint Menchould, a strong place within the government of the Duke of Nevers, which he had secured; and there also arrived Hault-fontaine, where, instead of a war proclaimed, he found a Treaty well advanced; He was received with much honour, and admitted also to their Counsels; Upon his arrival, it was given out, that he came with an offer of eight thousand foot, and two thousand horse from his Master, on purpose to hasten the Treaty, and yet was he sent back to the Duke with an assurance that there should be none, and a request to raise armes : But Hault-fontaine assured him that the Peace was concluded, and that Amboife was to be given to the Prince, Menchould to the Duke of Nevers, and a round summe of money to the Duke of Bouillon, and that an Assembly of the States general was promifed; which in a fhort time after was performed: And thus did their own private interests intercept their regard to the confideration of the publick.

The Duke of Vendosme, who, after his escape, had levied many men in Britany, and engaged himself in the fortification of Blavet, was much troubled to see himself thus forlorne: He sent Roche Giffar to the Duke of Rohan, with earnest perswasions to joyne with him, which were well mixed with faire promises in fayour of those of the Religion: But all could extract no other anfwer from him, than that the best counsel could be given him, was to digest, as well as he could, his dereliction, and in time, to comply, lest his obstinacy should draw upon him an inevitable ruine. But this advice had no operations upon his resolutions; though the Prince, when he came into Poitton, added his perswasions too. and endeavours to approve of his precipitation of the peace: The Prince was also very serious to see the Duke of Roban, who to satisfie him in that particular, came to La Roche des Aubieres in And jou, where he shews him, how he had been forced to shuffle up a peace the best he could, for that the Marshal Boilillon, ambitious of all the thanks and profit, had debauched and seduced most of his party (speaking well indeed of none but the Duke of Nevers) so that he was constrained to accept of Amboise; That he hoped to procure an Assembly of the States General, in which his party would be the most prevalent, for that every one in their Province, stickled hard for him; and that it was there, the assairs of the Kingdom should have a redress, and the Nobility enjoy their dignities, or else that they should have more forces, and a better pretence for a War; that though he had cast off many Gentlemen and Souldiers, yet he regarded not that much, for that he knew, France was alwayes well stored with discontents

To which was answered, that the States would rather oppose his designs, and instead of augmenting, lessen his authority; for that the sear of evil, and hope of good, the most prevalent motives upon the affections of men, were from the Queen, not him; and that the reason, why many resuled to take Armes, though he commanded them, was, because he himself did not, but had made his peace; for which he was upbraided both by the Duke of Rohan, and his brother; of which he excused himself the best he could, with many large protestations of friendship to them, and a high approbation of the Counsel they had given the Duke of Vendosme; and thus was their interview terminated: After which, the Prince to make his advantage of all, wrote to the President Janin, that he had desired a meeting from the Duke of Rohan for no other end, but to break off the consederacy between the Duke of Vendo (me and him.

This being past, all parties were very industrious to procure a nomination of fuch Deputies in the Provinces, for the States General, to be convened at Paris the winter following, as were most devoted to them; And in the mean while the King and Queen rook their journey towards Britany to reduce the Duke of Vendosme: When they came to Poietieres, Villeroy disparches to the Duke of Rohan one Villette (whom he knew to be a friend of his) to let him know, that their Majesties passing within twenty Leagues of him, would take it ill if he neglected to come and wait upon them, affuring him of a fair reception; and that it was fuch an opportunity to fet himself right againe with them, as in prudence he ought not to let slip: Upon this encouragement he went thither, where, after a very good welcome given him, they engaged him to be present at the States of Britany to be held at Nantes, where all their propositions were answered with a free all nt to them; whether they concerned the Deputations for the States General, or the Duke of Vendosme, who was forced to 1-63 present himself before them, and wholly submit himself to their pleasures. This done, they returned thence, it being presently after the Autumn, to Paris, whither a general curiofity carried every one to see what would be the issue of the States General. The Prince was in very good intelligence with the strongest party in the Parliament, occasioned rather by their hatred to the prefent government, than by any influence from his vertue or good conduct; for had his life and actions been in any degree proportionable to his pretences, and Remonstrances, he would have much disturbed the Queens government. Come we now to the States, who affembled at Paris about the latter end of October, in the year 1 6 1 4: where all things paf-

sed according to the Queens desire, who notwithstanding dissolved them, without giving them any satisfaction at all: The Prince was faine to yield up Amboife againe, which he had gotten at the Treaty of Saint Menehould; and that by the advice of the Marshal Bouillon, who thought by shewing the power he had over the first Prince of the blood, who only might lawfully question the actions of the Queen, to render himself so acceptable and considerable, that of necessity he should be employed in the management of the publick affairs: But remembring that his fervices had been less recompensed than his differvices, and that men stood in awe of that aspiring spirit, so apt and ready for any great undertakings, he resolves to imploy it again to mischief; and taking occasion from the ill propositions made in the States, from the treacheries discovered there, by a presumption to establish the Papal in prejudice of the Royal Authority, from the Decree made by them for the confummating the Marriages with Spaine, from the prodigious greatness of the Marshal d'Ancre universally envyed, and maligned, especially in Paris; and from the discontents the Deputies the States carried back into their provinces, all which things he so dexterously ordered for his purposes, that from that foundation he raised a broulliery of that importance, that even those that thought not at all of meddling in it, were insensibly engaged in the party.

The better to arrive at his aimes, the Marshal Boiillon drew into the confederacy with the Prince all the Grandees of the Kingdome, whom either some particular injuries received, or envy (the basest, yet most common vice of all) had discontented; handles the Parliament of Paris so handsomely, that the greatest part of them favoured his design, prevailed so farre upon the English Embassadour, that he incited his Master to countenance his party, and made Rouvray, Desbordes-Mercier, and Bertheville, Deputies General from the Assembly of those of the Religion, perfons of great abilities, and good repute, his own; shewing them the remedies he would apply to the disorders of the State, the advantages should thence accrue to those of the Religion in general, and themselves in particular; to wit, to the one the place of Embassadour into the Low Countreys, to the other the revenue of a Counsellor in the Chamber of Edicks; and to the third, the Deputation General; all very persivasive arguments.

When he had thus disposed his affairs, leave was granted for an Assembly to be held at Fergeau, the fourth day of April, which place was judged improper for a free debate, and attaining the ends proposed; wherefore it was removed to Grenoble the sistenth of July, one thousand six hundredand fifteen, upon the instant request of the Deputies General, and the Provinces, and the assurance the Marshal Lesdiguieres gave the Queen, that he would ender all things so, that she should have no cause to feare the issue of it; which place, though the vast power, and well-known humour of the Marshal might cast some umbrages of suspicion on it, could not however be refused, because that Dauphine was a Province, in which those of the Religion were most numerous and powerful, and where without danger they could not be dis-

Whiles these things were in agitation, great care was taken to incense the spirits of the Parisians, and with such effect, that the Parliament set forth a Declaration, inviting the Prince and Peers to joyne with them in their Consultations; which though they were checked for, yet delifted they not, but proceeded to the presenting of very bold Remonstrances to the King himself, whose Substance was, that he ought not to begin the first yeare of his Majority with such absolute commands, nor accustome himself to fuch actions, which good Kings, as himfelf, very rarely had recourse to, and after an exaggeration of the great and signal services of their Court ever fince its first establishment, and that all the weighty and most important affaires of the State were managed by their Counsel, or that the Kings had repented: it, they remonstrate the displeasure they had to see that the Late States should endeavour to subvert the Fundamental Law of the Kingdome, by rendering the Soveraign power of the King doubtful, and problematick; that for the suppression of such pernicious Maximes, and that his Soveraignty which he holds only and immediately from God himself, be not upon any pretence whatsoever subjected to any other power, it were necessary to ordaine, that the Original Laws of the Nation, and the occasional decrees founded on them be renewed and put in execution; and those held for enemies to the State, that would subject the Royal Authority to any forraign domination: Moreover they remonstrate also how necessary it were to continue the ancient Alliances, and forraigne Confederacies renewed by the late King; that the King should be also advised by the Princes, Officers of the Crown, and veterane Counsellours, persons experienced and interessed in the State, and that none be permitted to receive pensions of forraigne Princes or States: That all Officers be protected in the discharge of their duty: That for the future no survivances or reversions of Offices be granted: That the Military commands be not Vendible: That the governments of provinces, strong places, and principal Military commands be not conferred on strangers: That for the conservation of the dignity and splendour of the Romish Religion, without derogating from the Edicts of pacification, and for the preservation of the priviledges of the Gallick Church, and rechifying the abuses crept into it by means of Suffragans and Coadjutors, there be not suffered any multiplication of new Religious orders; and that Bishopricks be conferred on persons of good Families, and suitable qualifications, both for age and vertue: That the course of Justice be free, and all obstructors of it punished; and that the Kings Council upon applications made to them, may not abrogate any decrees of the Parliament; but that those who would sue for relief against them, do it by the usual and Legal wayes: That no pardon be granted to any Murtherers: That Edicts and Ordinances against Duels be observed: That the decrees of the Kings Council be more stable, and not reverseable upon every occasion, either for money or favour: That the exactions and irregularities committed in the Chanceryes of the Parliaments, and Presidial seats, and Taxes raised without verification in Parliament be suppressed: That all societies of Counsellors of Estate, Intendants, and other Officers of the Finances, or Exchequer, together with all parenerships, be forbidden: That all publick gaming, and tippling-houses be suppressed: That provision be made against the abuses of treasurers, and the offendors punished; and that the excess of rewards be moderated: That the Government of the Exchequer be intrusted but to a few persons, as in the time of the late King: That the profusion of the treasures may be compued from this; that the Revenue is greater now, than in the late Kings time, who spent every yeare in buildings and other expences, now taken off, three millions of Livers, and laid up two millions; that if those five millions had been laid up every yeare fince his death, there would be in the Treasury twenty millions; besides the fourteen millions he left there, which, to the great regret of all good French men, are now confumed; extravagancies of fush a nature, as will quickly fend

Send France a begging, if not remedied; which cannot be but by a Brist inquiry into the actions of those that have been guilty of these male-administrations of which they know their Majesties to be intirely innocent: Wherefore they most humbly implore their leave, to put in execution their decree made in March, one thoufand fix hundred and fifteen, promising to disclose to them things of great concernments to the State, which are yet hidden from them; by means of which, provision may be made for prevention of all these disorders: But in case that the evil Counsels, and crafty Artifices of persons interested herein, shall hinder these Remonstrances of a faire reception, the said Parliament solemnly protests, That for the discharge of their consciences, for the fervice of their Majesties, and preservation of the State, they shall be obliged hereafter to nominate freely the Authors of these abuses, and lay open to the world their wicked comportments, that remedies may be applyed in due feafon, when the affairs will more conveniently admit of them, and his Majesty shall please to take better notice of them,

This Remonstrance wrought the designed effect, procuring the Parliament a sharp check, and affectionating them so much the more to the Prince his party: Hence enfued great animofities and very liberal discourses of all sides; and presently after, came Letters from the Prince to the King, the Quen, and all the Grandees both of the Court and Parliament, together with his Declaration, which resuming the business from before the War of Saint Menebould, complaines of the irregularities in the elections of the Deputies for the States general, of the elusion of the Article proposed by the third Estate or Commons, for securing the life and authority of the King, against the designes of the Pope; of the excessive Offices and exorbitant power of the Marshal d'An. cre, and his extravagancies in the administration of them, prefuming to deprive the Princes of their governments, and procuring Laws oppressive to the people, for the satisfying of his own avarices and ambition, disposing of all the Offices of the Kingdomes as well Ecclefiastical as Temporal, infringing the liberty of the States, to which the Prince was forbid an access, causing the Parliament of Paris to receive a smart reproof for their Remonftrance; concluding the marriages with Spaine, without communicating the business to those it ought to be imparted to, by such pastices flighting and deferting the Ancient Allyes of the Crown. and among others the Duke of Savoy; who, to the great dishonour of France, is suffered to be trampled in the dust; causing a refusal of the propositions made by the Nobility to the States, for the observation of the Edicts of Pacification; attempting to induce duce the Clergy of France to sweare an entire observance of the Council of Trent: That it was most unreasonable that the Marshal d' Ancre, the Chancellour, the Commander de Sillery, Eullion, and Dole, Authours of all these violent actions, and mischievous Counfels, should be maintained in such an unlimited power: The Prince also further demanded, that before they proceed to a consummation of the marriages with Spaine, some course be taken for regulating the Counfels, and reforming, and compofing the abuses and disorders in the State: About which, he had several conferences with Villeroy, to amuse and intrap him, rather than out of an intention to contrive any remedies for them: At length upon the Summons given him by Pontchartraine, to the voyage into Guienne to confummate the Marriages, forefeeing thence the wrack of his hopes, and pretences of a good Reformation, he declares that the Armes he had raised, had no other aime than the preservation of the Kings authority, and the glory, and honour of the Nation, inviting all good French men, both of the one, and the other Religion to joyn with him, and all the Ancient Allyes of the Crown, to favour him in so good a defign.

When the Prince had published this Declaration, he made his Levyes in France and Germany, and took his Canon at Sedan: The King also raised an Army of ten thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse, Commanded by the Marshal de Bois-Dauphin, to oppose the discontents, and with other Troops sets forward towards Guienne, attended on by the Duke of Guise, who was to condust Madame the Kings sister to the Frontieres of Spaine, and there to receive the Infanta, and waite on her back to the King.

In the mean time the Prince earnestly sollicites the Assembly at Grenoble, by his Agent La Hay, who delivers them his Manifesto, and thews them the advantages would redound to those of the Religion, in case the Assembly would comply with him in reforming the State, and opposing the matches with Spaine; and further engages himself not to conclude any thing but by their advice. The Prince his party, nor their adherents, durst not open their mouths to second this motion; But yet the others imagining that from so important an opportunity they might with good reason derive strong hopes of obtaining some favour from the King, they deputed Champeaux, Desbordes-Mercier, and Mailleray, to him, who found him at Tours, and presented to him five and twenty Articles of greatest consequence to their Interests, humbly supplicating him to vouchsafe them some satisfaction thereupon. Of these Deputies, Desbordes-Mercier was of the Prince his faction, the other two were of the same opinion with the Duke of Reban, who thought chought the first equally affected to him with the others; of whose abilities being very conscious, he reposed an entire confidence in him: He received Letters from him from Poictiers, which gave him notice of their distatisfaction, and urged him to a conjunction with the Prince, affuring him that the Affembly would be well fatisfied with it, and also do the like themselves: The other two Deputies governed by this, joyned in this intelligence, informing him moreover, how much their Majesties slighted the Asfembly, so that adding to this, the refusal made him of the Survivance, or Reversion of the Government of Poittou, (to which his father-in-law had given his consent) contrary to the solemne promises passed to him for it; together with the perswasions of his brother the Duke of Soubize, who was well affected to the Prince, he began to stagger a little: Besides, in his return to Saint Fohn, from Saint Maixant, where he had been to see the Duke of Sully, he met a Gentleman belonging to the Count of Saint Paul, who defired his affiftance to oppose the Marriages with Spaine; and was seconded by Saint Angel, Savignac, and Doradour, who in the name of all the Governours, and Nobility of the Religion, follicited the same thing, and chose him for their General, confirming him with an affurance, that the Count of Saint Paul would deliver up Fronfac to La Force, as a pledge for the performance of his word.

The accumulation of all these things, to wit, the hope of Redeeming himself from the neglect and slights lately thrown upon him; the follicitation of his brother, together with the defire he had to serve those of the Religion, overpoised his former resolutions, and fent him into Guienne, where he found that the Count of Saint Paul, with the Romish Catholicks, had made their peace, and a great confusion among those of the Religion; nevertheless, having gotten together La Force, Boisse-Pardaillan, Chasteau-neuf, Favas, and Pamissant, with others of the Religion, it was resolved, that they should make use of the leasure afforded them by the Kings stay at Poictiers, occasioned by the fickness of Madame the Princess, to prepare for a War; feeding themselves with hopes to raise an Army of six thousand Foots and five hundred Horse, which at their first Rendezvouz amounted but to fix hundred Foot, and fifty Horse; nor could all their power ever bring more, than two thousand men together; so that the King easily, and without any interruption got to Bourdeaux, whence the Queen Mother disparched Chesnay to the Duke of Rohan, with very fair offers, upon condition that he would joyne with her: But neither he, nor Bois-de Cargois, who was deputed from the Assembly with the like Commission, could get any other

Other answer from him, than, That he would not faile to make good his word, where he had engaged it: But this failing, the Queen endeavours to take off La Force, and Boisse-Pardaillan from him; As for the former, he conceived himself obliged to the desence of Bearn, and the other persisted in his integrity.

The Duke of Roban's chiefest care now was to engage in the party he had embraced, all the Towns, and Communalties of the Religion, together with the Assembly General, whom by express Messengers, he advertises, that upon the resusal of favourable answers to their propositions, and the earnest sollicitations of their Deputies, he had now declared in Guienne, and his brother in Posetiou, perswading them to own their actions, and adhere to the Prince: The Duke of Soubize, who had staid at Saint John during the Kings abode at Posetiers, immediately after his departure, makes his levyes in Posetiou, and Xaintonge, and suddenly took the field with sour thousand good Foot, and five hundred Horse, which were very opportunely ready to receive the Prince at his arrival there.

In the mean time the Duke of Guife conducts the Princesse towards Spaine, and brings thence the Infanta; whose voyage afforded the Duke of Roban the opportunity to seize upon Lectour, by the affiftance of Fonterailles, who let him into the Town, where, when he was entered, he besieged the Castle, and forced it to surrender, before the Duke of Guise could relieve it, or the Assembly of the higher Languedoc interrupt his defign: From thence he marchesto Verdun and Mauvo fin, which he could by no means draw to his party; and thence to Montaubane, which, though with much reluctancy, he got to declare for him: In this March he mer with the Duke of Candale, who difcovered to him his intention of embracing the Reformed Religion; after mutual complements they part, and the Duke of Rohan keeps on his way towards Languedoc, to the Affembly, who by reason they had not the freedome they expected at Grenoble, were adjourned to Nismes, where his dexterous endeavours had such happy success, that maugre the power of Chastillon, which the vertue of his Ancestors had acquired him; he destroyed all his credit with them, made himself be acknowledged General of the Seuenes, and so prevailed upon the Assembly, that all the opposition Chastillon could make in it, or in Languedoc, could not hinder their conjunction with the Prince; whose Partifans seeing themselves backed by the Dukes of Roban, Sully, and Soubize, at that time carried all before them; and Desbordes-Mercier, Crusel, and Novialle, were deputed to carry the Act of Union

32 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book I. to the Prince and get his fignature to the Articles agreed on: whose substance was,

To oppose the reception of the Council of Trent, and the marriages with Spain.

To procure a reformation of the Council, and an observation of the Edicts made in favour of those of the Religion; and that they should not desert one another, lay down their Armes, nor hearken to any pacification, but by a mutual consent.

At Montauban heard the Duke the first news from the Prince, though he had dispatched several Messengers to him; and thither he sent him word, That, notwithstanding the opposition of a strong and well-marshalled Army, he had passed the Rivers of Marne, Seine, and the Loire; and that having gotten the start of the adverse Army, he was now marching to joyn with him in Guienne, desiring him to march towards the Dordeigne, and for the security of his passeg, posses, himself of some places upon that River; which he quickly did, taking among others, Souillac, one of the best passes on it, and beating up the Quarters of the Count of Lauzune's Regiment that was barricado'd in two great Villages.

But the Prince, instead of that, took the way of Poitson, where he very seasonably met with the Duke of Soubize; for he was very weak in Foot, and his whole Army so harassed, that had not the Town of Saint John received him, and the Duke of Sally at length, with much ado joyned with him, causing also all the places he held in Poitson to declare for his party, he would have been but in a fad condition.

In the mean while their Majesties return towards Tours, the Duke of Guise commanding the Army of the Marshal de Bois Dauphin, and the Duke d'Espernon, with another, having the charge of their conduct: All these conjunctions with the Prince, raised him from the contempt he lay under, to so considerable a height in the opinions of his Adversaries, that he is now sucd to for an accommodation.

Now it is to be understood that the Marshal Bouillon and the Duke of Mayae, being more strictly ligued, and of greater intimacy with the Prince than any of the whole party besides, and confequently more sought after by the Court, resolved to have a peace, and purchase their own conditions at the expence of the whole confederacy: In order to which, a Cessation of armes is agreed on, and the Town of Loudun made choice, of for the place of Treaty; Invitations were sent also to the Assembly General, to draw as near to them as Sint Foy, where the Marihal Bone allow was in great reputation: But the Duke of Robins being advertifed by his brother of all their plots, discovered to his friends in the Assembly the whole mystery, and let them know, that it were expedient the Assembly should instantly remove to Rochell, where their authority would be greater, and their strength more considerable; and that for his patt he was resolved to go to the Treaty, though not summoned to it, leaving Bresse Pardaillan, in his absence to command in Guienne.

Before we proceed to the particularities of the Treaty, there are two very observable things to be taken notice of. The first was the Duke of Nevers, his arming, without declaring for either side, but pretending as a Mediatour to enforce both parties to an accommodation, out of an apprehension he might give them to sway the ballance on that side he should incline to: A thing seasoble by the King of England, or of Spaine, but a ridiculous attempt for him. The other was nothing more Judicious, and that was a resembling action of the Duke of Vent of ness, who by the King's Commissions had raised a considerable force, but joyned not with the Prince till after the truce; so that, he served for nothing but to inhaunce the conditions of that party he declared for, and frustrating himself of all means to make his own, being of himself not considerable, attracts to himself the odium and malignity borne to the whole party.

At this Treaty there were present of the Kings part, the Marthat Briaffac, Villeroy, the President d' Thou, a' Vic, and Pontchartraine, who fedulously fought by sowing divisions among them, to weaken the confederates, and confequently leifen their conditions: The Prince, weary of the War, pretends nothing but a defire of peace, renouncing in appearance, all further thoughts of the publick affairs, and demanding only a fatisfaction of the interests of particular persons, but resolving principally to find his own there too: He had ingaged to the Duke of Vin losme, not to consent to any peace, unless he had the Castle of Nantes given him: To the Duke of Longueville he promised the Cittadell of Amiens, and to those of the Religion, a confirmation of the Edicts: But when the Duke of Miyne, and the Marshal Bouillon were arrived at their ends, they quated all thoughts, but how to make the rest relinquish theirs, to effect which, they used all manner of Artifices, the most crafty and pregnant inventions could furnish them with: But the admirable constancy of the Assembly General at Rochell, and the firm union between the other Grandees, threw insuperable difficulties in the . way to their designs.

But in the mid'ft of these transactions, the Prince falls desperately fick, which caused a great confusion among them all, and made them more follicitous to have this affair dispatched: The Duke of Sully was defired to go to the Affembly, and represent to them the dangers, that attended the present condition of things, whence he returned, with a full affurance of their good inclinations to peace; which three dayes after, they confirmed by ten Deputies they fent with an express charge to supercede all former demands, that might retard the conclusion of the Treaty; confining themselves to an obtention only of all expedients, necessary to confirm and secure to them their former Concessions: mong which were the continuation of the Assembly where it was, untill the verification of the Edict; the disbanding of the Armyes; the restitution of Tartas; and the dispatch of the Commissioners appointed to put the Edict in execution, according as the Duke of Sully had promised them in the Princes name; which he clearly made appeare by his instructions, when the Prince receded from the aforesaid promise: But the King's Commissioners encouraged under hand, infifted eagerly on the dissolution of the Affembly, which had like to have broken all, had not the Duke of Sully, pregnant in evaluons to prevent mischiefs, firmly perfifted in his endeavours to compose the business, offering another Writing to the Commissioners, which they approved of, and defired him to procure the Deputies of the Affembly their affent to it also, which, with the affistance of the Dukes of Rohan, Candale, and Soubize, he so happily endeavoured, that they affented to it, upon condition, that there might be an alteration of some termes; And for a smuch as the Commission of the Deputies was too restrictive, they joyntly sent an express to Remonstrate to the Assembly the necessity of terminating this affaire, and to that end defire fuch an enlargement of their power, as should oblige them to ratifie what they should conclude in their names, and with the advice of the Grandees of the Religion: The Dake of Sully thinking he had now finished all, carries the faid Writing to the King's Commissioners, with whom were prefent the Dakes of Nevers, Maine, and Bolillon, who all confirmed it, and after them the Deputies also: But when he returned with it again to the Commissioners, they denyed what they had done; but yet as the Duke was going from them, they recalled him againe, and after much contestation came once more to an agreement: After which they all met at the Duke of Nevers his Lodgings, who treated the whole company at Dinner; where the King's Commissioners, for the third time, so altered the Writing, that there was nothing left of its first defign' defign; for which reason the Duke of Sully would no more trouble himself with it.

.Whereupon the Prince caused the Grandees to be called to fign the Peace; he was yet so ill that he could neither unde fland it, when it was read, nor comprehend the difficulties vet to be surmounted: Nevertheless he called the Duke of Sully to know what hindered the figning of it, which being told him, he calls Villeroy, and having whispered something to him very softly, presently declares to the Duke of Sully, that Villeroy had given him the Writing just as it was at first designed with the advice and confent of the Duke; and without expecting the Anfwer of the Assembly, or any reason to the contrary, signed it : Whereupon the Duke of Bouston had many sharp contests, real, or pretended, and delufory, with Villeroy, for that he defired that the English Embassadour, who had been a great instrument of the Peace, should fign it too, which the other opposed as a thing neither handsome, nor honorable for the King to suffer.

This precipitate figning of the Peace by the Prince, occasioned great and general murmurings among the rest of the Party, that faw themselves thus deferted by those that were the Authors of the Warre: And the Duke of Bouillon, to enhaunce the price of the services he had done the King, bitrerly inveighs against the Assembly, branding them, and all that should abet them, with the name of Rebells; offered to march against them, and declared that he should esteem for enemies to the State, all these that upon any pretence whatsoever, should resuse to signe the peace; But neither his, nor the threats of the Commissioners prevailed ought upon the others constancy. And because this brangling was a disturbance to the Prince, the whole company removed to the Counters of Saiffons Lodgings, where every one, all other difficulties being cleared, to avoid disputes for the precedency, subscribed his approbation apart, and none, but the Prince, and the Deputies, figned the

But when all was done, this War wrought no alteration at all in the publick affairs, but what was procured by those of the King's party, who made use of this occasion to revenge them-Selves upon their enemies: So Villeroy, and the President Fanin, whom the Chancellour de Sillery had formerly put by, that he might have the fole administration of all affaires, caused the seals to be taken from him, and committed to the President Du Vair : But Villeroy nothing advantaged himself hereby; for the Marshall d' Ancre, conceiving a jealousie, that at the Treaty he held correspondence with the contrary party, to out him of the Cittadell of 36 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohani Book. I.

Amiens, caused his Office of Secretary of State, to be given to Mangot.

When this business was thus concluded, every one departed, but diversely affected, and very ill satisfied one with another; and the next day came the full power from the Assembly to their Deputies to conclude the Peace. The Marshal Bouillon, and the Duke of Trimouille, to infinuate themselves the more into the King's favour, engaged themselves to the Commissioners, by an Act under their hands and seals, to rout the Assembly, and all that should presume to justifie them, in case they resused to dissolve, after the six weeks prorogation accorded them, was expired.

If the number of the d'scontents on the Princes side was great, it was not less en the other: The savour of the Marshal d' Ancie was more insupportable to those, that upheld, than those that opposed him: and he also perceiving himself more tyrannised by his creatures, than his enemies, made the late reconciled party believe he would enter into a firm and strict amity with them; which the Duke of Guise suspecting, he also, to cross the Marshal d' Ancre's aimessseeks after an union with them too: And in order to it, makes his applications to the Marshal Bouillon; who fed him still with very sair words, and hopes, that in case he sailed of his end at the Court, he might have a good occasion to intangle it in new perplexities.

Some dayes before the conclusion of the Peace, it was proposed in the Prince his Council, that the Grandees of his party should enter into an inviolable League amongst themselves, that two of them should alwayes in their turns, reside at Court, whilest the others kept at a greater distance from it; and that every one of them should embrace the particular interests of the others; The Marshal Boiillon rejected that Proposition, as unseasonable, for that, having occasion to dis-oblige the greatest part of them, he foresaw this might discover his intentions; and besides, he was yet desirous to derive his advantage from the merits, and exteem of his services: But after the Treaty was concluded, himself renewed the some proposal, which was then also as unseasonable, because their minds were now too much varied from what they were, and they so jealous one of another, that every one steered his course by his own particular interest.

The Prince went to take possession of the government of Berry, given him in exchange for that of Guienne; The Duke of Mayre, and the Marshal Bouillon to the Court, to try how the pulses beat there, but principally to reap the fluit of their services; The Duke of Sully to his government of Poisson; The

Duke

Duke of Rohan to Rochell, to inform the Afferably of what had passed at the treaty of Loudun, and to procure a nomination of good Deputics general: But the Court Caball being united with the Pince his faction, and the hopes of favour, gratifications, and pensions, he gave to those that should incline to his will wholly governed them, so that Bertheville, and Mainald were chosen.

The Duke of Rohan feeing how he was hated at Court, and that the success of all things thwarted his projection, resolves to make an Essay upon the Duke of Sully for the government of Poictou, of whom when he had obtained a demission of it, his Patents were prepared, according to the tenor of the Articles of the Treaty, upon condition that he should go to receive them at Court, which he resolved to do; and there delivers himself freely to the Queen, telling her, that the flights she had thrown upon him, had induced him to let her Majesty know, that he was neither voide of refentments, nor destitute of power; that, it was true, he had ferved and obliged a most ingrateful person, which he was very fensible of, and that if the pleased to vouchfafe him a pardon, and amnesty for his actions against her, and admithim again to her favour, he vowed that except the party of the Religion, he would devote his most faithful services to her, against all the world besides; of which offer and protestation she restified her belief by her acceptance of it.

But to return to the Marshal Brailion; he employed the uttermost strength of his whole abilities to gain an admission to the helm of State, declaring that he was the only man could, at his pleasure, rule, and dispose of the Prince, who was also the only person could prejudice the authority of the Queen, and that consequently his satisfaction, and employment would free them from any further apprehensions, whatsoever: But the Marshal a' Ance, who had ingressed all the power, being the only Favourite, and intended to change the whole Council, to place therein creatures of his own, thought it not convenient to suffer the introduction of such a one; which the other perceiving, stuffs the Princes head with new jealouses, to prevent his returne to the Court.

There were the Countess of Soissons of the one side, and the Princess of Corde of the other, that extreamly rejoyced at the report of the Prince his intentions to return thither; but all (so jealous were they one of another) agreed to divert him from them, unless it was by their means that he came; which he knowing very well, waved them all, and by the mediation of Rechefort, and the Arch-Bishop of Equizors, secretly made his peace with the Quen, fixing himself upon her, and to protect the Marshal d' Ancre, with the exclusion of his own party; provided he might be folely intrusted with the management of the publick affairs, and made Chief of the Council of the Revenew.

Coming to Paris against the good liking of those afore-meny cioned, he was welcomed with loud acclamations, and applauies, and refumed a great power in the State: The Duke of Rohan, with the Queens permission, gave him a visit, and sharply reproached him for figning the Peace, without expecting the Commission from the Assembly; which he excused, saying, that he was induced to it by an apprehension he had, lest the Duke should hinder their granting it; and when he afterwards underflood that he was reflored to the Queens favour, he told him he was very glad of it, for that he had now brought no other resolutions with him, but to enjoy himself, mind his own affairs, and no more to intermeddle in any factions, but entirely to adhere to the King, the Queen, and the Marshal d' Ancre: And when the diffatisfaction of the Great ones, and principally of the Marshal Bouillon, who was supposed to have an absolute power over him, was objected to him; his answer was, That he now very well perceived his drift, and the subtleties he used to perfwade him, that the welfare of the State confifted either in peace or War, according as he was pleased, or displeased, and that he would no more floop to that Lure.

On the other side, the Marshal Bouillon though he saw himself quite cast off, despairs not, but for fear of exasperating him, covers the displeasure he had conceived against the Prince, with a feening approbation of all that he had done; and that his Counsels might be of greater validity with him, draws the Duke of Guise, with his brothers, and the Duke of Nevers, into an union with those of his party; taking advantage of the Parliaments, and Parisians hatred against the Marshal d' Aucre, and by the means of Linnes, who now began to be the fole Favourite, exposes him to the King's also; and communicated to many of the prime Nobility his defign to secure the Court by the death of the Marthal d' Ancre, who had bartered away the King's Lieutenancies in Picardy, and the Cirtadel of Amiens, together with that of Normandy, which the Duke of Montbagon had, and referved to himself the government of Peronne, Montdidier, and Roye: The Duke of Longueville, enraged to fee himself disappointed of Amiens, and the rest of Picardy, purfues his defign, loudly proclaims to the world his discontents, and the Intelligence he held with the Town of Persone, enters it, and · possesses:

possesses himself of the Castle, before any one could stir to prevent him. Mangot, the new made Secretary of State in the place of Villeroy, is fent thither by the King, but to no purpose, for that the Castle was already delivered: At his return from this fuccesseless voyage, the King, being advised to handle this business with all gentleness possible, sends the Marshal Bouillon, who made two journyes thither, but brought not back the fatiffaction, was defired; and indeed his own particular aime was to confirm the Duke in his conquest, to the end that he might engage him, and his friends, in the defign he still pursued. And one day, having affembled the chiefest of his Confederates, to confult about the killing of the Marshal d' Ancre, the Duke of Maine, who was supposed to be the most zealous in the business. offered to kill him himself, provided that the Prince would be there, and that it was necessary to know his resolution therein; the Marshal Boilillon replyed, That they ought to beware of that, but that he would undertake to make the Prince avow the action when it was executed, but that it was dangerous to impart it to him before, and that he should not by any means have any notice of it, till it were ready to be put in execution, that he might not have leafure to retract: But the obstinacy of the Duke of Maine carried it, and the Prince when he was acquainted with what they had resolved on, whether it was, that he feared the issue of it, or that for this once he would be a man of his word, that very Evening let the Marshal a' Ancre know, by the Arch-Bishop of Bourges, that he could by no means abandon the Duke of Longueville, and that he revoked the promise he had made to protect him: Whereupon the Marshal, the same night posted into Normandy; and there seeing himself forsaken by the Prince, and many of the Great ones, combined to affault him in the Court it self, contrived how he might prevent them: Informs the Queen by some of his Confidents, that the Prince deceives her, that the Marshal Bouillon amuses her, that many of the great Nobility were resolved to devest her of her authority, and that the business was already come to such a point, that she had no other remedy left her, but to seize upon their persons; on which she resolved, with Manget the Bishop of Lucon, and Barbin, creatures of the Marshal: And on the first day of September, upon a Thursday at noon, was the Prince arrested in the Louvre, by Themines, who for that action was created Marshal of France; and that which is very remarkable in this, is, That upon the same day of the moneth, and of the week, and at the fame houre was he born: They thought to have surprized the Duke of Maine, and the Marshal Bouilion there also; but the former lodging near Saint Antheny's Gate, had opportunity snough to escape; and the other being that day gone to a Sermon at Charenton, was advised by his friends to return no more ; to they went to Sviffons, and the Duke of Guife and his brother took the fame way also; The Duke of Vindosme also fled towards La Fore; The Duke of Rohan, who at the very beginning of these commotions had quitted the Prince, was not however without his fears, when he faw him carried away by Themines, and that immediately upon it Saint Geran came to enquire after him from the King. This arrest caused a great tumule in Paris, which was encreased by the Prince his Mother, as dimany Gentlemen, who animated the people of the Suburbs of Saint Germaine to plunder, and raze the Marshal d' Ancre's house, which they found so sweet an employment, that the pillage of it lasted two daves; and indeed great prudence was it, not to oppose them in the hear of their fury: For the next day Crequi Colonel of the Regiment of the Guards, with one company of them., and another of the Citizens, eafily took them off from the prey, which in the height of the hurly burly would have proved a greater difficulty.

9.4

Their Majesties gave notice of this Mutiny to those of the Nobility that remained in Paux, and likewife to the chiefest of the Council; among whom, the Duke of Sully spake his mind freely, and declaring his diflike of the action, advised them to compose those differences by the intervention of the Pope his Nuncio, and other Embassadours, but so, as that the full power to determine all should remaine still in the King, and the Queen his Mother. But this Council was disapproved, and the way of force made choice of: In the mean while the Marshal Bouillon fers all his wits on work, to engage the Duke of Guise somewhat further, offering to make him chief of a party, where he should command all that durst dispute the place with him: rells him moreover, that what they did, was to restore the first Prince of the Blood to his liberty, and take the King out of the hands of the Marshal d' Ancre, against whom the general hatred had evidently appeared by the burning and pillaging of his house in Paris, even before the King's face; that if they should speedily gather together their friends, and fire all the Mills about Paris, they should cause a greater insurrection there: But when he faw that these perswassions prevailed nothing upon him, and that he wastreating for his return to Court, where he was offered to Command the King's Armyes; he then moved to have him florped; which the Duke of Mayne would not give 6737 C.C.

Thus

Thus all the Councils of the Marshal Bail Mon were rejected, though they were very good; For, in excremities, things will not admit of redious deliberations, and ballancings of future events; and many times a rath attempt closely pursued, meets a fortunate success, when circumspection (in such a case) ever fails: Which clearly appeared here; for the Queen having drawn the Duke of Guife and his, brothers, changes the Officers of State, giving the scals to Mangot, the Office of Secretary of State to the Bishop of Lucen, the Intendancy of the Finances, or Treasurorship to Barbin, appeales all popular tumults, and by a Declaration, verified in Parliament, criminalizes all that had absented themselves; Raises several aimies, and gives the command of that in Champagne to the Duke of Guife, that in the Isle of France to the Count of Auvergne, and having made Montigny Marshal of France, and Governour of Berry, fends him thither, who fecures the Province, and makes himself Master of the Tower of Bourges: The Marshal de Souwre does the like to the Castle of Chinan, which by the treaty of Loudan was given to the Prince. In the beginning of the yeare One thousand fix hundred and seventeen, the Duke of Guise stormes some places held by the Duke of Nevers, which, without any great refistance made, he takes, and then prepares for the fiege of Meziers. The Count of Auvergne also takes Pierrefors, and marches towards Soiffons: And the Duke of Maine attempting to beat up the Quarters of the Duke of Rohan, Colonel of the light Horse-men, in Villiers-Cotrets received a shrewd repulse: In the mean time the Marshal Beillon retires to Sedan, where he endeavours to strengthen himself with some forraign assistance: Thus were the assairs of the Princes but in a fad condition, even then when their deliverance appeared by the death of the Marshal a' Ancre, which occasioning a change of the whole face of things, it will not be impertinent, in this place to infert a particular relation of it.

The unlimited power of Favourites is the ruine of a State: For either they change it themselves for their own ends, or essentially give the ambitious opportunities to attempt it, or at least are they made the pretences of all the disturbances that happen in it: For seven years had the Marshal d'Ancre surnished France with such pretexts, and that great people, whom the raign of Heny the greathad accustomed to a subjection to the government of their king himself, universally hated him, imputing all their mischiefs continually to him; So that his death silled every one with hopes of an amelioration: But those quickly vanished, when they saw Luynes, a man of a mean extraction, cloathed

thed with his spoiles, and at the first rife advanced to greater authority; who by the paf-time, and delights he shewed the King in Hunting, and by his low submissions had raised himself to the highest place in the affections of a King, who was then but fifteen years old: A Prince very fingular, and jealous of his authority, which yet he understood not at all, and more apt to believe the worst, than the best: It was a matter of no great difficulty to perswadehim, that the Marshal d' Ancre aimed at a power would prejudice his, and that the Queen Mother was confenting to it, that the might continue the rains of Government, as in his Minority, in her own hands; For the insolencies which alwayes accompany great Favourites were exreame in the Marshal d' Ancre; and the Queen Mothers neglect of her some too apparent: So that Luynes having before hand dealt with Deagent the chief Deputy of Barbin, who was Intendant of the Finances, caused him that night to entertain the King with a discourse of the mischievous plots were contriving against him; and out of hopes of some great advancement, he made his treachery against his Master the foundation of the designe: Marcillac, his Affociate, was he who had formerly betrayed the Prince to the Queen, and now betrayes her to the King: Defplans an ordinary Souldier in the King's Guards, had a share in this employment too, for that he had been a servant to Brantes, who was brother to Luynes: In short, in the contrivance of this design were employed only base and infamous persons; but to Vitry Captaine of the Guards was the execution of it committed, who was commanded to kill the Marshal, and for recompence, was promifed to be made Marshal of France; which accordingly he performed as he was entring the Louvre: At the same time were arrested also the Marshal d' Ancre's Lady, Mangot, the Bishop of Lucon and Burbin, and then were the Chancellour de Sillery, D.s Vair, Keeper of the Seals, Villeroy, and the president Finin sent for to resume their Offices. After this were the Queenes guards taken from her, and some of the King's appointed to wait on her: A Gallery also that led from her Chamber to a Garden she had caused to be made, was broken down; nor was she suffered, without leave, to see any thing, but the fad conversion of her authority and liberty, into a low and despicable condition, and miserable servitude.

Expresses were sent into all parts to give notice of this change, all hostility ceases, every one returns to the Court, where all strive, who should soonest and most impudently renounce that, which but four and twenty hours before, they adored; It being the property of generous fouls only to follow those in their adverse, whom they honoured in their more prosperous fortune; The Duke of Roban got leave to visit the Queen-mother, the ftrength of whose constancy was still superiour to the violence of her pressures: And then, seeing himself regarded with a frowning eye, and taking small pleasure to see those he had so lately fought against to be the only welcome persons, goes into Piedmont, where he arrived a little after the taking of Verseil, and passing the Summer there, he saw an action worthy to be observed, and related. Don Pedro de Toledo, after he had taken Verseil, which had endured a long siege, to refresh it, divided his Armykinto Montferrat, and the Dutchy of Milan, and quarters it about Alexandria, a Countrey abounding in corne, and all manner of necessaries: In the meane while the Duke of Savoy's Army recruited, and the Treaty of peace was still continued by the mediation of the Cardinal Ludovisio on the Pope's behalf, and Bethun on the King's; several conferences had they with Don Pedro; In the interim of which, the Marshal Lesdiguires, who commanded the relief fent by the King to the Duke of Savoy, to defend his States, but not to attempt upon the Duchy of Milan: having fent to discover how the Spanish Army lay, made a propofition to beat up the Quarters of two thousand men, that lay in Feliffan, a Village that was but flightly barricadoed, and feated in the middest of all the other Quarters: proving by many reafons, that, though at fifirst ght the designe might seeme very hazardous, yet really was it not fo, for that marching that way one night with all his forces, at break of day he beat up that Quarter, which hindered the Spanish Armies rallying, and was the reason that those he had left behinde him, having no retreat, were utterly lost. This motion took the wished effect; For the Duke of Savoy having appointed his Rendezvous at Ast, marched by a private way, which avoided Nice and La Roque, and came to Felissan, which was instantly begirt, and forced, for they had no need of the Canon, which Shomberg Marshal of the Camp, was bringing up with the Rear-guard, with which he was commanded to take in a Castle, to secure the provisions, which he did: The next day was taken a place called Quatordeci, in which were four hundred souldiers: The same day the Duke of Savoy gives the Duke of Rohan three hundred horse, to cut off some Cavalry of the enemies, that were coming from Alexandria: As he was marching to execute that defigne, he discovers 300. horse and 1200. foot marching from Cazal to Alexandria; He makes towards them with his whole party, but, notwithstanding he used all diligence possible, he could not reach them before it was dark,

dark, and that the enemy had sheltred himself in a very advangeous hold; A proposition was then made for the incamping round about them, and fending that night for two thousand horse, that might be ready there to defeat them by break of day; and I believe this project might have taken; But the consideration of leaving the rest of the Infantry at Felissan in the middest of the enemies Quarters, who might eafily beat them up, caused them to resolve upon a retreat: So that after a dayes stay at Felissan, they marched towards Nice, which they surrounded, and in twice four and twenty hours, was the Town forced, and the Ca-Ale surrendred, in which were near two thousand fighting men: The next day finding L.t. Roque quitted, they pursue those that were of the garrison, who were all Switzers, whom they overtook, and made prisoners: Thus in the space of one week, were taken four thousand five hundred of the enemies army; which being so weakened; and the Duke of Savoy finding himself to be more than twenty thousand strong marching men, had designed to enter in to the Duchy of Milan; when lo, from France comes the conclusion of the peace, with a Command to the Marshal Lesdiguieres to get the Duke of Savoy's affent to it, which he effected: But return we now to the affairs of France.

Luynes feeing that fo short a time had vested him with the entire spoyls of a most eminent Favourites seven years toyleshaving the fole influence upon a young Prince of fifteen years old, whose Mother he had mortally offended, being himself but of mean parentage, and without any support in the Kingdom, not studied, nor any way versed in State affairs, and yet governing all with a most absolute authority, makes use of Deagent, and Modene as his chief Counsellors: And the next care he had, was to impose a Confessor upon the King, of an immediate dependance upon himself, so to awe him by their superstition (a powerful engine to work upon the spirit of a young Prince) and to place about his person petty inconsiderable fellows, who amufed him with childish toyes, and kept so close a siege about his perfon, that none could be admitted so much as to speak to him in private: After this he caused the Queen-mother to be conveyed to Blois, where she was most strictly guarded: And then, that he might enrich himself with her wealth also, proceeded to the arraignment, and trial of the Marshal d' Ancre's Lady; in which he used such unla viul sollicitations, and took such unusual courfes to procure her death, that at her execution, the former hatred of the Parifians against her was far exceeded by their passienate commiseration of her present calamities; caused Mangot to be confined to his own house; the Bishop of Lucon to be relegated to Avignon, and Barbin was fent to the Bastille; and then marries the Duke of Montbazon's daughter to strengthen himfelf with an Alliance not obnoxious to envie; having for that reafon refused the Duke of Vendosm's fifter.

When he had ordered the feethings after this manner, he caused to be convened at Rowen, the most eminent of the Nobility, together with the principal officers of the Parliaments (called the Assembly of Notables) that without parting from the King at all, he might put himself in possession of the government of Norman-cy; where the distunion of the Grandees, their insidelity, and pusillanimity, together with the base and service spirits of the Officers and Deputies of the Parliaments, present at this Assembly, confirmed the Authority of this upstart Favourite, so that every one yeilding to his yoak, he began now to think himself sufficient to dispose even of Fortune her self.

The Duke of Roban, who was now allyed to him by his wife, who was of his family, courts him too, among the rest, endeavouring to reconcile him rather to the Queen, than the Prince, who from his Prison had already sent him Overtures and promises, that in exchange of his liberty, he would support him with his affistance, and fixe him in an impregnable condition; He told him, that he could not long, keep them both prisoners; that he that was there before, his advancement could have no colour to lay his restraint to his charge; and that it was an easie matter to hinder his deliverance, that the Queens condition was different, who one time or other would escape from him; for though she were kept also under guards, yet was it with more respect, and not as prisoner; and that such guards were not so secure: He added moreover, that if the Prince regained any power in the State he would be a more dangerous opposite than the Queen-Mother could, that he was of a good wit, quick, highly ambitious, and coverous; that though he was not of a vindicative nature, yet was he not obliging neither, nor had he the least friendship for any one; that being not able to detaine them both still in pr fon, it was necessary he should strengthen himself with the affistance of one of them; and that however he had displeased the Queen, yet would fhe prove his furer prop, for that she was not so prone to intermeddle with the affairs, as the Prince was; and the jealousies that were between the King and the Queen (which he knew well enough how to mould to his own advantage) would be his fecurity against them both; Luynes feeming fatitfied with these arguments, encouraged the Duke by all means to mediate this reconciliation; who having a fervant named La Ferte, who was an intimate friend of Larbins, had by that incans an opportunity to let him know the service he intended to the Queen his Mistresse, to which the Duke of Montbazon, Luynes his Fatherin-law, was also much inclined. Barbin, (by the means of Bournonville, Governour of the Bastille, where he was a prisoner) gave the Queen intelligence of what had passed, advising her to write letters to the King, Luynes, and to the Duke of Montbagon; to the first, full of complaints of vindication of her self, and of respect: to the other two to do her all good offices to the King: the draughts of which letters were first carried to the Duke of Rohan, who amended them, and corrected the acrimony of some expressions in them: But the Bishop who was to carry these letters, in whom Earbin greatly confided, proved false, and most perfidiously betrayed the whole plot; yet, according to the instructions hereceived from Deagent, made he several journeys to the Queen, but with treacherous purpofes to work the ruine of her, and all else that had a hand in this businesse: But seeing that this design tended only to a reconciliation, and yeilded no colourable pretences to ground any acculation on, they flie to fubtilties; and in Bournonville's name, defire a Ring from the Queen, as a testimony of her acceptance of his service, for that being brother-in-law to the Marshal Vitry, he could not otherwise believe she could have any good thoughts of him: The Queen, though somewhat surprized with this demand, yet could it not raise any jealousies in her, for that the Bishop who was employed in all these errands, was a creature of Barbins, made some difficulty to part with the Ring he defired, as unwilling to give any thing that was not worthy of her, but promifed to have one bought purposely at Paris; But he importuned her so much, that she took one from one of the Ladies attending her, and gave it him: The Bishop carries it to Deagent, who kept that, and caused another to be made just like it, which he conveyed to Bournonville, as if she had voluntarily, and of her own accord sent it him: After this they infused jealousies into the Kingsthat the Nobility had a design to surprize the Louvre to introduce the Queen, and restablish her in her former authority, and that all that were of the conspiracy, wore a blew Ring on their finger, which was the cognizance of the party:" And Luynes one day thuts the Duke of Rohan into his chamber, where he entertained him with discourses, that the King was certainly informed that he was alwayes much devoted to the Queens fervice, that he knew all his machinations for that end, and the secret negotiations of La Ferte; but of regard of his alliance to him, he had prevailed with the King to pardon him, and therefore now it was fit he should tell him all: This proposition was with much disdaine rejected by the Duke, who replyed, that he was

was no Informer, and that he was glad they knew his actions which had no other aime than the King's fervice; that he confessed he was a servant to the Queen-Mother, and that it was the duty of every good Frenchman fo to be.

After all these contrivances, and many others which never came to my knowledge La Ferte was taken prisoner, and committed to the Bashille, confronted with Barbin, and both of them were brought to their tryal; and notwithstanding the importunate sollicitations made in favour of them, and were admitted of purposely to intangle more people, the result of all was, the depriving Bournon-zille of the Bashille, the perpetual banishment of Barbin, and of La Ferte for sive years, who, notwithstanding never stirred at all from his Master.

These violent procedures filled the Queen with great sears and jealousies, and made her more solicitous to free her self from this captivity, being now well affured that the hopes Luynes gave her of it, sometimes by Cadanet, sometimes by Modene were but only to amuse her, especially when she saw that the negotiation of Arnoux the Jesuite and the King's Confessour came to nothing; this Jesuite made the King solemnly swear at Confession, never to dislike what Lnynes did, nor to meddle himself with any State affairs.

The confideration of all these things made her at length resolve to work her enlargement; and co effect it, by the advice of the Marshal Boilillon, she made choice of the Duke d' Espernon, whom the knew to be a man of great power, valour, and prudence: But he was displeased with her, and came to Court with full intention to fide with the King; he must therefore be brought about; which the Queens servants deriving much advantage from the Favourites ill conduct, very dextrously performed: And first, they terrifie Luynes with the great power, and haughty humour of the Duke d' Espernon; qualities not tolerable by one who aimes at a general adoration: On the otherfide they exasperate the Duke, who was of a touchy nature, and unaccustomed to a basa and servile subjection: The first occasion they took from his atrempts to promote his youngest some to a Cardinalat, for the which he was the first upon the Roll, and received all possible asfurance of it, but was put by, by the contrivances of Villerey, who preferred Marquemont: But Villeroy dying immediately after, he continues his pursuit, with great hopes still: But the Cardinal de Retz having made Deagent, and by that means gained Luynes; carried it; but not without obliging himself by promises unworthy a person of quality, with poor and infamous submissions, which he still so religiously observed, that being afterwards made, Prefident of the Council, he seemed rather to do the duty of a Deputy to Deagent, than of a Cardinal.

This was opportunely feconded by another occasion derived from the Keeper of the Seals, Du Vair, who, hurried by his own pride, or the instigation of those that were desirous of new troubles, would needs take place at the Council-table, of all the Dukes and Peers of France: The Duke d' Espernon, as the most ancient that was then there, complains, in the name of all the rest, of it to the King, who took it ill from him, and the interest of the Gown-men, was preferred before that of the Peers of France: This stomached him so, that he brake out into many bitter invectives, even against the King himself; so that it was no hard matter to perswade him that there was a designe to send him to the Baffille, confidering the late Prefidents before his eyes: The Queens servants, (who would not discover any thing of their intentions to him while heremained in Paris) fo handsomely improved his jealousies, that one morning very early, and withour taking leave of any body, he goes thence to Maz. When he was there, Ruccelay, the chief contriver, and manager of the whole project begins with him, by moving a reconciliation between him, and the Marshal Bouillon; and then imparts to him the Queens defigne, with her request to him, to procure her liberty, with many large promifes annexed to it, of which, in fuch cases none are sparing: The almost insuperable difficult es and dangers of this enterprise, together with the ingratitude, the usual recompence Princes reward great services withal, at fift startled, and caused some hesitation in the Duke of E. gernon : But then the glory would attend the execution of fo high and noble a defigne, the indignation he conceived at the small regard was had of him, together with his defire of revenge, (passions predominating in all great courages) overcame all the suggestions of his fears: When he had resolved on it, he proceeds in it with that caution, secresie, and good Fortune, that having made all necesfary provisions for Meiz, where the King, purposely to keep him at a distance from the Court, where he feared him, amused him with pretended and imaginary designes, he passes through France into his governments of Xaintonge, and Angoulmois, and there effected the Queen-Mothers deliverance, on the one and twentieth of February one thousand six hundred and nineteen, who came from Blois to Loshes, a place belonging to the Duke, who there went to receive her with two or three hundred Gentlemens who all conducted her to Angoulefme.

This escape of the Queen caused a great confusion at the Court, where it was conceived that her party was much more

humerous, or that it might quickly swell to a bigger bulk; wherefore great preparations were made for war, that the enfuing peace might be more advantageous: The command of the Army to be fent against the Queen was given to the Duke of Mayne, who was thought to be the most an enemy to her, and most faithful to Luynes; and because it was conceived that it would be acceptable to him, to him also was committed the charge of the negotiation of Bethune: Sollicitations were also made in the behalf of the Bishop of Lucon (who till then had remained in exile in Avignon) for his return to the Queen, and inforced with promifes made in his name, by his brother in Law Pott Courley, to incline the Queen to fuch a peace as should shoot with the King's desires, and also to sowe jealousies between the principal authors of her deliverance; in which he failed neither of his endeavours, nor fucresse. For Rucelay, who had as largely contributed to her liberty as any one, left her in discontent, and drew with him the Marquesse of Mauny, and Themines, who afterwards proved one of the greatest enemies to the Queen, who found her self but in a bad condition ro engage in a war, by reason that many envied the gallant action of the Duke d' Espe, non, few would submit to his imperious humour, and every one believed that all would end in peace, and were therefore unwilling to imbarque in an affair, by which they should gaine nothing but the King's displeasure, and hatred, whilest others carried away the glory of the enterprise: For which reason also the Duke of Rehan, being sought to, by the Queen, fent her word, that he was much troubled that he was not privie to, and imployed in the beginning of her defignes which if he had, he would have ferved her most faithfully: But being at Court then when she made her escape, he was commanded by the King to his government of Poilton, to preserve it in peace ; that, for his part he would do her no harme, but advised her to make a peace, in which he was confident Bethune would ferve her ; and that being in full liberty, and fecurity, she would have more favorable conveniencies to raise a greater number of servants and friends than at present: Schomberg did cleare otherwise for to endeare himself beyond the other Zealots for her ruine; he laid a plos to blow her up by firing the Magazine at Angoulefine, which was happily discovered, and prevented. At length was a peace concluded, and near Tours was the interview between the King and the Queen-mother, to whom was given the government of Anjow, and for her better security, the Cassles of Angier's, Pont de Cé, and Chinon.

Come we now to the affairs of Beart, the fourse and rife of all our evils, which will retract our view as far back as the death of the Marshal d' Ancre, after which Du Vair, Keeper of the Seals, being restored to his Office; upon the sollicitations of the Bishops of Bearn, and imagining he should do so eminent an action, as would gaine him such reputation at Rome, would advance him to the dignity of a Cardinal, he procured an order of the King's Council, for restoring to the Ecclesiastiques of that Countrey their goods that were formerly aliened by authority, and had for fourty, or fitty years been imployed for the maintenance of their Ministers, Academy, and the Garrison in the Fort called Navarrins. La Force, then Governour of that Countrey, was at Court at the same time, and mainly opposed the Order, shewing the difficulties would obstruct it, and the inconveniencies might arise from it; which I conceive he did with very sincere intentions: But being over-powered, turns his desires to his own private advantage, and promifes to promote the execution of it, upon condition he might be made Marshal of France, which was promised him: But either the difficulties he met withall, or rage to see himself laughed at at Court, made him resolve to stand it out against all; In which he met with great opposition in the Countrey, occasioned by those of the house of Benac, backed with the Count of Grammond, his deadly enemies, and by the politick practices of the Court, so that he was now hated by all parties for not doing what he might for the satisfaction of either.

The Duke of Rohan, who was his friend, patronized him still at Court, and, seeing that the Kings Commissioner Renard cast all the blame of the ill successe he had in his voyage upon La Force, used all means possible to compose the businesse, shewing that if the Province of Bearn should addresse themselves to the Reformed Churches of France, their particular might grew into a general cause, from whose circumstances might arrive some accidents not easie to be remedied, and that it was the wisest cour se to quench this fire before it were throughly kindled: That it was most reasonable (since the thing was begun) that the King should receive satisfaction, and the Countrey also should be secured; and that partial persons were most unfit to be imployed in it: I hese reasons were the better relished, for that they already began to discover several Assemblies in the Provinces, and to sear the event of them: And now were things in so fair a way, that the Duke of Rohan had obtained a re-imbursement of the like sum of money restored to the Ecclesiastiques, to be had out of the next receipts; and in case of non-payment, permission was granted to the Countrey to seize again upon the goods of the Ecclesiastiques. But for as much as La Force found not his advantages in this accommodation, he was easily induced to reject it, complaining to the Court, that to discredit him thus, was the way to disable him for any future services, and to those of the Religion, that it was an introduction to the ruine of the Reformed Religion in their Country: And notwithstanding that all the Churches of Fiance, were, upon good deliberation, satisfied with this agreement, yet never could the people be induced to it, so that the dispute lasted till the Convocation of the General Assembly of those of the Religion at Loudun, the three and twentieth of May, one thousand six hundred and nineteen.

Luynes in the mean time did all the ill offices he could to the Duke of Roban, endeavoured to criminalize him, for buying the government of Maillezais, of Aubigny, and of a private house in Poicton which was very strong, and which he compelled him to pull down; having, but a little before it was razed, engaged some in an attempt to surprize it; and though those that had undertaken it, were taken as they were teady to put their designe in execution, yet ordered he things so, that he could not have justice done upon them : After this, having released the Prince from the Bastille, to strengthen himself with his power against the Queen, and the Prince declaring himself an open enemy to the Duke of Rohan, the Duke resolves to adhere entirely to the Queens service, of which he went to Angiers to assure her; and understanding of the party was raising for her, he advised her not to stay there, but to remove to Bourdeaux; that her most faithfull servants were the Dukes of Mayne, Espernon, and Rohan; that being there, she would have a powerful Parliament to declare for her, and that there she was secure from any invasion before she had an army ready to dispute the field; that if she stayed at Ar. giers, and that if Pont de Cé were taken from her she and her whole Party would be lost without one blow striking; that she ought to give the greater confidence to this Council, because it was to his own disadvantage, for that being so near the King, he was like to be the first would suffer.

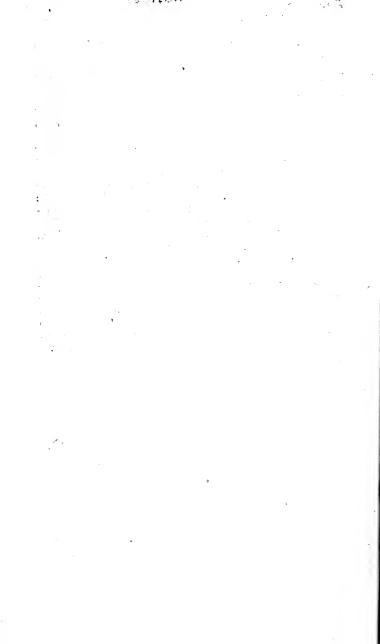

To this she answered, That she much approved of his Reasons, but that if she should follow his advice, it would give the Duke d'Espernon suspicions that she intended, to put herself wholly into the hands of the Duke of Mayre: Besides; the hopes the Countesse of Soffons gave her from Kormandy; built upon her Sonne in law the Duke of Longuevill:, who was sately made Governour of that Province, and was Master of Dieppe; and the Grand Prior who held Caen, and both of them had great correspondences in Rowen, prevailed so upon her, that she would by no means budge from Angiers: But desired that the Assembly at Lordum might be sont nucled.

continued, which might have been effected, but then it must have been by making such a division as at Saumure; when the Duke of Reham had conferred about it with the chiefest friends he had in the Affembly, and among others, with the Count of Orval, his brother-in-Law, who was very powerful among them, they concluded to accept of what the King offered, viz. Within fix moneths to give the Assembly satisfaction in the affair of Bearne, and the restitution of Leetour, one of their cautionary Towns, which if not performed, then should the Assembly convene again within one moneth after, and that at Rochel: This very well pleased the Queen, to whom it was farther manifested, that this new Convocation, being in spight of the Court, to be in the most considerable Town of their party, where none but the most resolute would come, and fi mly binde the Assembly to her, together with all the Reformed Churches in the Kingdom; But withal they defired her, that in case any peace was made, they might be satisfied concerning their two demands touching Bearne, and Lectour, which she promised.

Now, so violent and tyrannical was the government of Lagues, that it had wearied all the world, and even his best friends also, as the Duke of Maine; for whom, a little before, he had procured the Government of Guienne, in exchange for that of the Isle of France; and, not satisfied with this, he gives it to the Duke of Monthagon his tather-in-law, and feizes upon that of Pisardy with all the Fortresses there, and in lieu of it gives that of Normandy to the Duke of Longueville. Moreover, he and his two brothers were made Dukes, and Peers of France; and all vacanz Offices, Ecclefiastical Benefices, and Pensions were ingrossed by these three brethren, and distributed among their poor kindred that flocked in to them, from the parts about Avignon: So that jealousie, and envier, together with the badde administration of the publique affairs had rendred them so odious, that every one betook himfelf to the Queens party; Even the Prince of Piedmont, to whose marriage with Madain the King's fifter, he had, not long before occasioned; Luynes seeing himself charged on every fide, but supported by the Prince, perswades the King to prevent the Queen his Mother; and whiles by divers meffengers, he entertains her with hopes of an accommodation, and corruptes and seduces her followers; he makes fresh levies of souldiers; which the perceiving, does the like, and by the Vicount Sardigny fends a letter to his Majesty to let him know, how she is constrained to provide for the security of her person, to save her self from the fury of her enemies, who abusing his authority, imployit to ruine This, with the advice of the Prince, haftens the King into Normandy, to secure that Province, which was in a tottering condition, and much enclined to the Queen; but his Presence, though accompanied with but a small force, soon settled all: Rower is secured, Caën yeilded, Alencon also, and ali the Nobility submit. This happy and unexpected successe makes him proceed to Mans, and thence straight to Angiers; Great was the confusion this caused in the other party, especially in the Bishop of Lucon, who not suffering the Queen-mother to go where her greatest forces lay, for fear lest the should get out of his tuition, makes her resolve upon a pitiful defence in a town of no consideration, and an enemy to her party, that so intangling her in a neceffity of submitting to an inglorious Accommodation, he might make his own peace upon better termes; which he did, and from that time he ever held intelligence with the King's party. Moreover the Duke of Rtz, whether it was, that his Uncle the Cardinal de Re'z had gained him before, or whether his apprehension of the danger had altered his mind, most certain it is, that seeing the King's forces ready to fall on upon the works of Port de Ce, of which he had undertaken the defence, upon an imaginary discontent that a peace was concluding without his privity, he suddenly quits them, and with all his troops repasses the Loire; Thus was Pont de Cé taken, and the Queen who had thirty thoufand good men ready in Guienne, Poittou, Xaintonge, and Angoumois, was vanquished by five or fix thousand only, and reduced to a necessity of accepting such Articles as her enemies pleased to vouchsafe her; according to which, and her own particular order. the Dukes of Maine, d' Espernon, Rohan, and Soubize laid down their Armes.

DUKE of ROHAN:

The second Book.

Containing a Relation of the Warre against those of the Reformed Religion in France.

ND now are we arrived at the fourse of all our evils, and satal commencement of the Wartes against those of the Reformed Religion. The King, having thus happily put a period to this War, goes to Bourdeaux, where he suppresses the authority of the Duke of Maine, and commands the Bearnois that the late Decree be put in execution: But they, neither knowing how to obey him, nor defend themselves, oblige him in person to a voyage into Bearn: And there it was they first began to slight and laugh at the personnance of their parol engagements; For the next day after their arrival, and a solemne promise made to the Bearnois to preserve their priwiledges entire, were they totally devested of them, by the re-uni on of Bea ne to France, and changing, contrary to the engagement of their faith given the Governour of Navarrins.

Morecyer it is to be known, that the Deputy general Favas, who was in pursuit of the government of Lettour in the behalf of his son, the more to induce the Court to yield to his request, threatned to fend to those at Rochel to convene the Assembly general, according to the power given them by the Assembly at Loudan: But feeing, that prevailed not to compasse his designe, and not considering how unseasonable it was, he writes to those of Rechel, from Bouldeaux, to cause the said Convention, advising them also to repair their fortifications; And thus are the publique continually swallowed up by private Interests.

When the King was returned to Paris, the Affembly general meets at Rochal, and Fayas Still followes the Court, to finde some means to accomplish his desires; His Majesty in the first place, forbids the holding of the faid Assembly, next commands their disfolution, and lastly declares them Traytors: The chief of those of the Religion, conceiving that great prejudice to them would attend their obstinacy, were of opinion that they were best to dissolve upon certain conditions, of which they had hopes given them from the Court: But the Letters which Favas sent thence, together with the particular discontents of La Force, and Chaffillon, by reason of the hard usage the one received in his Offices, and a defire the other had to have more, occasioned the continuance of the Assembly; whence the King took a pretence to prosecute his designes to the uttermost, to which, the basenesse, and treachery of the Governours of the Cautionary Towns facilitated his accesse.

It is to be observed, that before the Kings departure from Paria, the Dukes of Nevers and Maine were in great discontent retired into Champegne, and the Count of Soffors to Frontevault: The Duke de Luyres, that he might not leave such thorns in his back, was very destrous to recencile them; and to move them to it, Faruas was sent to informe the Dukes, that he was now going to the Assembly with full satisfaction to all their demands, and that it would be prudence in them to comply, before the determination of that offair; the like speech was made to the Count of Soissans by Killarmoul, which wrought all their returns to the Court, and occasioned the reconciliation between the Cardinal de Guise, and she Duke of Newrs.

After the reducing of these Princes, the assurance Villarnoul gave of Sai muse, the desection of the Governours of the Cautionaty Towns in Postone, the revolt of Pardaillan with a part of Guicane, that of Chastillan in the lower Languedoc, and that by the presence

The Dukes of Roban, and Soubize his brother, who had oppofed the convocation of the Assembly, and earnestly endeavoured their diffolution, when convened, seeing such a rout, resolved not to abandon the party: The Constable, who was their kinsman, many times sent to try their pulses; but neither his promises, nor threats, made the least impression on their consciences, or fidelity: The last Messenger was the Colonel Arnaud, who brought them Letters from the King, full of perswasions to quit their resolutions, and intermixed with menaces of an inevitable ruine in case they obstinately persevered in them; and withal to let them know that the first siege would be that of Saint John & Angely: But this journey had a double end; for, in case he prevailed not upon the two brothers, he had Orders to conferre with the Major General Auriac, who was then at Saint Julian, about a quarter of a League from Saint John, with four thousand men, to cause him to put in execution a design he was entred on, by means of the intelligence he had with the Captaines, Galloix, and Vaux, and two of the inhabitants, whose names were Mafures, and Requier, who had promised, if he would approach with his Troops, and fall in upon the Suburbs called Mata, and thence make up straight to the Gate, they would be ready there, with their confederates, and keep it open; which Auriae attempted the very next day after Arnaud's departure from Saint John; But the presence of the Dukes of Roban and Soubize, both which were yet in the Town, prevented their success; Soubize was resolved to abide a Siege; and Rohan three dayes after went to Roshelle, from whence he brought and put a thousand men into the Town, with above an hundred Gentlemen, besides two Barques laden with all manner of provisions; and then went back to Guiente. Hc

He was defired by the Affembly to reconcile La Force and Pardaillan, to which the former was very much inclined, but the other would not so much as see the Duke of Rohan, by which he clearly perceived his engagement to the Court: La Force defired Robin to take a view of the Communalties of the lower Guienne, that he might the better take order for the security of the division the Assimbly had allotted him. From thence he goes to Bergerae, Saint Foy, Clerae, and Tonaeras, and thence to Nerac, where the Chamber, or Court of Justice yet was, but must be removed, before they could secure the Castle, where the Court fate, and where the President, a Romanisi, lodged; who after many contests, at length withdrew with one Gentleman, whom the Duke of Robin gave him for his Convoy as far as Maranande: But the President made but an unhandsome return of this civility: For when he returned to Tonneins, he gave Vignoles intelligence of it, who about a League from Tonneins lay in ambush for him, with six or seven score Gentlemen Voluntiers armed at all points, and three other Troops, who let them pass, and then the first Troop followed their Rearc, the second marched up to flanck them, and the third, which was the strongest, between the other two, that they might be ready to relieve the other upon all occasions: The Marquess de la Force, who commanded Rohan's light Horsein'n, was lest to make good the rerreat, with thirty of Lt Force his guard, whom he caused to alight from their Horfes, and thirty other Horfe, among which there were but ten Curraffes: The Marquels advertises Roban and La Force, that the enemy marched towards him, whereupon they face about, and advance, commanding him to charge them: But the Soft Troop in Tead of ecciving the charge, flew off towards Vigroles; when prefently half of Lz Force's Guards gave them a Volley, which killed and hurt about five or fix Men and Horses, which made them keep off ar a Musquet shot distance from them. The second Troop, which flanked them pe ceiving a little Ditch between them and Rohan, fell off, as the first did: Which V groles seeing, advanced not at all with the third, so that without any further interruption, they kept on their way to Tonneins: Among the Troops of Rohan, and La Force, were there but fourteene Cuiraffes; and of Gentlemen, and their fervants, not above feventy fix Horfe.

After this, Rohan left La Force who very exactly knew the Countrey of the lower Guienae, and went from Nerae to Montanban, fetching a compass of above five and thirty Leagues, by reason that the Marshal Themines lay in his way, and arrived there on the eighteenth of $49, One thousand six hundred and twenty

wenty one: At Montauban he received intelligence that Nerae was befreged by the Duke of Maine, who commanded in to him the Marshal, and all the Nobility of Guyenne: La Force at the same time makes an attempt upon Caumont, surprizes the Town, and layes a fiege to the Castle; The Duke of Maine having a strong Army, resolves to releive it, and to continue the Siege of Nerac also, in which he had a fortunate success; and the Duke of Roban, to divert Themines, lies down before Septfons, 2 place belonging to himself; and when he had drawn him thither, with above five hundred Voluntiers, he retired to Realville, and the Marshal to Puy-la Roque: whence, after three or four dayes abode there, he drew away againe, and the Duke went to Montauban, to preserve the adjacent Countrey from the ravage and spoile intended by the Marshal, who followed him thither, where there passed between them some light skirmishes, of no great conlequence.

Whiles the Duke of Roban remained at Montauban, came news to him, of the rendition of Saint Fohn, and also of Pons, which was fold by Chasteau-neuf, of the revolt of Pardaillan, the loss of Saint Foy, and also of Bergerac, by the treachery of Pardaillan, and Panissault; of the taking of Nerac by the Duke of Maine (who was drawing towards Gascony) which was followed also with the loss of Leetour, Leyrac, Mas de Verdun, Mauvoisin, and the Isle-Jourdan; all which places the Governours for money yielded up into the hands of the Duke of Maine. Nor did they behave themselves better in the lower Guienne: For Tournon, Mont-Flanquin, Puymirol, and divers other places were delivered by their Governours; and, which is most predigious, Favas, that was then with the Assembly general, at Rochelle, commanded his sonne to give up to the King Castel-#1loux, and Castetz, two cautionary places, and remote from the King's way about twelve or fifteen Leagues. In short, of all that great Province, no place made any semblance of opposition but Clerac, which was well fortified and manned, there being in it (comprising the Inhabitants) three thousand fighting men.

These great losses made the Duke conceive, that seeing there had not been any resistance made in La Force's division, he should suddenly have the Royal Army upon him: Wherefore he takes care to provide for Montauban, marks some of the outplaces necessary to be fortisted, makes up the Regiment of the Count d'Orval ten Companies, reduces the Inhabitants into thirty, and orders all things sitting for a long Siege, and resolves himself to go to Castres, thence into the lower Languedoc, to raise up their dejected spirits there, and prepare some relief for Montaubon.

He departs thence attended on by his own guards, and accompanied by the Count d' Orval and his, fords over the River Tarn near the Isle of Albigeon, where he met with some opposition; at this pass, was the Captain of his guards wounded; the Captain, with some of the Count d' Orvot's guards, and one of his Mules were killed, and his Gentleman of the Horse, had his Horse hurt: Thus passed they to Castres, whence the Count d' Orval returned to Montanban to expect the Siege

In the mean while, the Duke of Roban, that he might lose no time, sends to the Sevenes, and the lower Languedoe, for a supply of four thousand men, and he himself goes as far as Milland, where he understood by the Messengers he had sent thirther, that though the people were generally well inclined, yet would the Artisces of the disaffected prevail over their good intentions, unless he himself advanced to the Sevenes.

Chastillor, at the same time, sent Briquemant to the Duke of Robin, to invite him to a conference, which he accepted of and to that end advanced as far as Saint Hippolyte, where the faid Briquemant returns againe to the Duke from Chaftillon, to let him know, that he very much wondred that he should enter into the divition allowed him, and that he suspected it was with a defign to prejudice his authority: It was an wered him, That certainly he had no good memory, and withal was shewn him the Letter he had written to the Duke, that the only expedient to drive him out of the Sevenes, and stop his passages into the lower Languedoe, was, not to impede the succours he had demanded, which rather than faile of, he would encounter all difficulties whatfoever: that if he was desirous of an interview. he was very ready to fatisfie him; and that if he would in perfon go to the relief of Montanban, ashe had offered, he was confident, they two would be able to procure the peace of the whole Kingdom.

In short, after he had strugled with many difficulties, he drew at length four thousand Foot out of the lower Languedot; and the Sevenes, and, with his own money raised a thousand more, with which he returns againe towards Millaud, from whence he sent Orders to Malauze, Leran, and Saint Rome, who in his absence commanded; the first in Albigeois, and Rouergue; the seeond in Foix; and the third in Lauraguais, to make ready the forces of the Colloques: He sent to Castres also, and upon his march eaused all necessary provisions of meal, and bread, for the nourishment of his Souldiers to be made ready.

In the mean time the King having befreged, and by reason of their intestine divisions for want of a Commander in Chief. taken Clerae, and feized upon all the places about Montauton, except Saint Antonin , fate down with his Army before Montauban on the one and twentieth of August, One thousand fix hundred and twenty one, (where La Force, with his two fons, were gotten in) and sent the Dake of Angaulesme, with fifteen hundred Horse, and soure thousand Foot, to lie upon the River Tarn, and intercept the relief was preparing for Montanbon; who made as if he would befiege Lembez, a place, about half a League from Realmons, where there was a Castle that commarded the Town, and held alwayes for the King. The Duke of Roban, receiving intelligence of it from Malauge, and also of the conspiracy in agitation for the delivery of Castres, with all speed fends away Boye, one of his Colonels, with a thousand foot, and a faithful promife to follow him fuddenly with the rest of the Army.

When Boyer came to Castres, he found that Malawre had drawn his main Body to Realmont; whither his coming also with this supply, raised the Duke of Angoulefine from before Lombez whereupon Malauge, instead of expecting the arrival of the Dake of Roban, ashe had commanded him, but fuffering himself to be carried away with the importunity of the multitude, goes with one piece of Canon, which he drew out of Realmont , to besiege a Church that was Garison'd and Fortist d, called La-Fauch, which as Boyer was viewing he was flaine, and the Duke of Angoulesme at the instant the Church was surrendred, came and inclosed the rest of the party with his whole Army: After feveral charges and skirmishes, in which Bulauze behaved himself with much Gallantry, and Saint Rome also, in rescuing him, (for he charged through the mid'ft of the enemy, with fitty Gentlemen (many of whom he lost) they capitulated to march off with their Armer, all but their Canon; and, for the space of fix months not to beare Armes for the party: Thus were all the forces with their Chiefs, and all the Nobility of Albigiois, and Lauramais, disabled from any service for the remaining part of that, and untill March the year following.

The Duke of Roban, for his part, loses no time, but advances with his Troops, and while his Rear-guard was marching up to him, draws the Canon out of Milland, takes Saint George a small, bur well inclosed place, and Lugarion a private house lying between Milland and Saint Afrique, in which there was a Garison that extreamly incommoded his passage; and had continued till he had cleared the whole way, had not the intelligence he received of the defeat at Fauch diverted him; that made him double his pace, fo that he came very opportunely to Castres; for Lombez was surrendred, Realmont was in Treaty, and the whole Countrey in a drooping condition: He cheered them up the best he could; yet all he could do, was not sufficient to get thirty Gentlemen, nor two hundred Foot tegether in all the upper Languedoe; So that his whole dependance was only on those he brought with him from the Lower Languedoe, and the Sevenes.

Another fear also perplexed him, lest in his absence, Chastillon should recall his Troops, to prevent which, he opposed against him an Assembly of five Provinces, viz. The Lower Languedoc, the Sevenes, Vivaretz, the Upper Languedoc, and Dauphine, who impowered him to detaine the supplyes he already had, and to raise more in case he had occasion for them.

Things being in this condition, the Duke sends to discover what Fordes were passable and not guarded, surnishes humself with good guides, and sormes his design to relieve Montauban, at the same time, by the way of Ville-nouvelle, by Saint Anion, and of Ville-Bourbon by Carming. The first of which is sive Leagues distant from Montauban, the other ten; so that he intended to put in his greatest relief, consisting all of Foot, on that side; and the lesser, composed of Diagoons, and threescore Reformado's only, on the other.

In the interim of these actions, the Constable Luynes seeing that his Embassies sent to the Duke of Rohan by Saint Angel and Saludie, could not move him, nor the persuasions of the Duke of Suly, and Lesdiguieres those of Montauban, who still replyed, That they would do nothing without the advice and confent of their General, resolved at length to give them leave to send their Deputies to him (who were conducted by Desplans) to try if that might produce an accommodation, who came just as the relief was ready to march: And very opportunely too; for the Duke understanding by them, that they wanted nothing but men, and that if they had but a thousand, or twelve hundred more, they were consident they should be able to hold out all that Winter, he promised them that, within eight dayes they should have the recruit they desired, gave them the Word, and Signal, and so they returned.

The Duke of Roban had five hendred Dragoons, whom with hopes of pillaging the Countrey up to the very Gates of Thoulouf, he had encouraged to advance towards Prylamens, Cuc, and Carmaing, Carmaing; but when they were all met at their appointed Rendezvous, he sent them orders, by one of his Gentlemen to march directly to Mentauban, which orders were not observed; either by reason of too much consideration, or apprehension of the danger, though there were less on that, than on the other side.

As for the other relief, commanded by Beaufort, one of his Colonels, it was better ordered: He marched from Castres in the evening, with about a thousand or twelve hundred menacemes to Lombez about one of the clock in the morning, where he stays till the next night, then fordes the Tain at Grave, marches all night, and the next evening about five of the clock comes to Saint Antonin, without any ill rencontre at all: There he stays all the next day, and in the evening sets forward towards Mortauban.

But the falseness of the guides he had taken up at Saint Antozin, who betrayed him, forced him to return thither againe: Three dayes after they sent him a guide from Montauban, who safely conducted him over the River Veyrou at a Forde, and brought him very well withinhalf a League of the Town; whence, notwithstanding the several parties both of Horse and Foot he perpetually met with between that and the Town, and the many Redoubts and trenches that obstructed his passage, he vanquished all those difficulties, and put seven hundred men, and nine Colours into Montauban: But Beausort himself came short of it, being taken in this brave action: And it is to be observed, that this relief which consisted all of Foot, marched every day almost eighteen Leagues in an enemies Countrey, forded through two dangerous Rivers, and passed through the mid'st of two Royal Armies that lay in wait to defeat them.

The Duke of Roham took a double course to prosper the defign of this relief; one was by sending Calonges, and Dis-Isles with Desplans to consult with those before Montawhan, about some way of accommodation; the other was, by marching at the same time that Beaufort did, with forty Colours of Foot, and those sew Horse he had, towards Lauraguais: So that when the Duke of Angoulesme was ready to pursue Beausort with all his Cavalry, he received intelligence that the Duke of Rohan, with the greatest part of his forces, was upon his march for Lauraguais, which put such a Dilemma on him, that he knew not which way to turn; and in the mean time Beausort passes through the mid'st of his Army, and the Duke of Rohan, the day sollowing, return'd to Casires, and sent back his Troops to the places whence he had drawn them.

64 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book It.

Calonger and Des-Isles were in the King's Quarters, when these supplies got in, and thence returned to Castres with Defplans, who from the Constable carried the Duke of Rohan an invitation to an interview, which he accepted of; and notwithstanding the dissiwasions of the people of Castres, and almost every one that was about him, he went to Villemur, and had a conference with him at Reviers, about a League from Montaisban, where after an exchange of many complements, the Con-Stable led him aside into an Alley, and there began with him in I am much obliged to you that you have reposed this manner; Such confidence in me; it shall not at all deceive you; you are no less secure here than in Castres: Being entred into your al-Ivance, I cannot but be studious of your prosperity; deprive me not of the opportunity, during the favour I enjoy, to augment the splendour of your house. You have relieved Montauban even before your Soveraign's face, a glorious and heroick action; but abuse it not: It is high time for you to mind your own and your friends advantage; the King will never confent to a general peace; see therefore that you make conditions for your friends and servants, and let those of Montauban know that they have but a short reprieve from their ruine; that the Forts and Lines drawn about them, have barred up alwayes to their further relief that, unless they now accept of reasonable termes, to wit either a Cittadel, Garison, or Demolition of all their fortifications, you will utterly desert them: As for Cafres, and the rest of the places in your division, propose what you please, and it shall be granted; and for your own particular, a blanck is offered you, infert your own conditions. In vaine may you hope for any affistance from Germany; they have more need to crave, than lend aide; or from England; you know the peaceable humour of that King; or from within our own Kingdome; the Queene Mother has all her support from Spaine, Rome, Savoy, and the Fesuites, who are no friends to the Huguenots; and as for Mon-Geur the Prince, a piece of money swayes him any way; Monsieur the Count of Soillons, I have received Letters from him and from his Mother, who is ready to fend him in to the King: As for the other Grandees of France, I doubt not but you receive encouragement from them; but 'tis with intention to purchase' their own ends at your expence. I have, with much difficulty hitherto hindred the confication of your estate and Governments, I cannot longer oppose it; you must either resolve to fall under a certain and ignominious ruine, or to advance your house to a greater height than it ever yet knew: For if you perfift inyour obstinacy, the King will rather yield to all those of the Religion, ligion besides, that he may have the satisfaction of making an example both of your person and samily: But if you will now credit me, you shall break through these dangers with honor, and the savour of your King, and obtain whatever you shall desire, as to your own fortune, whose encrease I so much desire, as that it may be a support to mine.

To which the Duke of Roban answered, I should be an ensmy to my felf, if I defired not my Prince his favour, and your friendship; I shall never refuse either goods or honours from my Master, nor from you the Offices of a good Kinlman: I very well consider the danger I am in, but I beseech you also reflect upon yours; you are mortally and universally hated, for that you alone ingross that which is the object of every ones desire: The ruine of those of the Religion is not so near, but that they may afford leafure enough to the Male-contents to forme their parties, and those that will not openly declare for us, will yet comply in g any thing that may tend to your destruction. The beginnings of the Warres against those of the Religion, have commonly been with great disadvantages to them, which yet the restless and volatile humour of the French, the discontents of those that ruled not, and strangers have many times repaired: If you can obtaine a peace for us from the King, before the like mischiefs happen againe, it will be much for his honour and advantage; having subdued the party without the least check, without any appearance either of divisions within, or relief from without, he will oblige his conquered, and manifest to the world, that itis not the Religion he persecutes, but the Professours of it; for their pretended disobedience, will break the nack of all other factions, and, without any prejudice received, will return a feared and honoured Conquerour: This will also redouble your credit with him, and feat you in a condition above the reach of any attempt whatfoever: But if you drive things on to the extremity, and this torrent of prosperity continue not its course, as it is like to finde a bay at Montauban, every one will re-erect his spirits, depressed by the business of Pont de Ce, and our later losses here, and infinite perplexities will you be involved in: Confider that you have already gathered all the fruits, that either your promiles, or threats can produce, and that what is left of us fight for a R ligion we believe to be the true one. As for my part I have already confidered of the loss of my estate, and Offices, which if you have retarded out of respect to our alliance, I am obliged to you for it, but am fully refolved, and prepared for all extremities, being folemnly engaged by promise, my conscience also commanding me, notito hearken to any but a genetal Peace.

This Conference, because they would not admit of a general Treaty, proving ineffectual, the Duke of Roban returned to Castres. The difficulties at the Siege of Montauban dayly encreasing, the Constable listened to the better dictates of his second thoughts, and renewed the Treaty: But the unsteadiness of his spirit, too sickle to perfect any thing, and the contradictions he met with from those that desired a centinuation of the War, intangled him still in delayes, till the King was necessitated to raise the Siege of Montauban, on the eighteenth of November, One thousand six hundred twenty one, where La Force, and the sirst Consul Dupuy, a man of great authority and courage ordered all things so exactly for the defence of the Town, and execution of the publick resolutions, that they may worthily claime a great part in the honour of preserving the place.

The Duke of Rohan in the mean while, had fent his troops into the County of Foix upon the follicitation of Leran, who with them took in some Castles. and afterwards laid Siege to Vareilles, which was relieved, and he, in some disorder, retreated to Pamiers: But feeing the King's Army now at liberty, having quitted the Siege of Montauban, he rook care to provide for those places were most in danger; and remanded his Forces from Foix: Saint Florent, one of his Colonels, and a Kinsman of the Constables, to make his own conditions, had intended to seize upon Saint Espuel; and in pursuance of that design, and that he might with less difficulty be received into the Town, with his Regiment, counterfeited a Letter from the Duke of Rohan; But the Confuls, forewarn'd of his purposes, refus'd to let him in; so that the stay he made thereabouts, gave the enemy an opportunity to prepare an Ambascade for him between le Mas and Revel; where in the night time he was totally defeated, without any resi-Stance made of his fide.

Mirambeau the eldest son of Pardaillan, perceiving that his father had compounded for Moubeur, and Saint Foy, and that he was to deliver them up to the King as he marched by, enters and seizes upon Monheur, the news of which hurried his father thither, who treats him very severely; and thinking he had now entirely secured that place, returns to Saint Foy to make sure of that also: But God would not suffer his treachery to elected longer unpunished, raising up Savignac of Nise, who lay in wait for, and slew him in an Inn in Gensac; whereupon Mirambeau in Monheur, and Terbon his brother-in-law in Saint Foy declared for the Party of the Religion: The King, having intelligence of this alteration, sends speedily to block up Manheur, and marches after inperson with the rest of his Army, besieges and takes it upon composition; During this Siege the Constable dyed of sickness; his death wrought a great change in the Court; The Queen-Mother, seeing her felf rid of her deadly enemy, begins to cheer up again; The Prince also returns to the Court, in hope now to Paramount it there; every one aims at the vacant place, and all remembrance of the designes contrived in the Constables life time was buried with him.

The Cardinal de Retz, and Schomberg, usure the management of the State affairs, the Prince came to wait upon the king at Poistiers, who joyned with them, and so potent was their party grown, before they came to Paris, as that the endeavours of the Queen-Mother, and all the Ancient Ministers of State, were nothing available to incline things to any propensity to peace. The Duke of Lefdiguieres, upon some commotions raised in Dauphine by Mouthur, immediately after the Siege of Montauban, got leave to go thither, and takes order for their suppression. The Duke of Rohan also sent the Troops he had out of the lower Languedoe, and the Sevenes, whither we must now restee, to see what this interim produced there.

Chastillor proposes to the Assembly of the five Provinces, the recalling of their Forces, upon pretence to relieve the lower Languedoc, which yet was no way invaded, but they rejected the proposition; so that, this invention taking no effect, as to prevent the Duke of Rohan of new supplies; he causes a new levy to be made (at which he was not present himself) which the Assembly gave way to, upon the engagement of the Captains to wait upon him, in case the Duke of Rohan should command them, which yet they refused to do upon his summons, saying, That they owned no General but Chastillon, but tristed away their time in besieging Alzon, a paltry Town of no importance. In short, Chastillon in all things, and places, opposed the authority of the Assembly, who, in requital (with the assistance of the people) devested him of all his power, forcing him to quit Montpellier, and retire to Aiguemortes, while they detained his Son, and Mother-in-law. Berticheres who was chosen Lieutenant of the lower Languedoc, adhered to the Assembly, who having tasted the sweetness of their authority, would by no means hear of a General, but continued their government till the latter end of the year, that the people began to find it insupportable; which they perceiving, elected the Dake of Rohan, who immediately fet forward towards the Province, and came to Monspellier on New-years-day, 1622.

68 The Memoiresof the Duke of Rohan Book II.

At his arrival there the Duke found the Provinces of the lower Langueduc, and the Sevenes, engaged in such broyles against the Assembly of the five Provinces, that he was necessitated to spend the whole month of January in endeavours to compose them: The Provinces declared that the Assembly had exhausted their treasures, of which they were resolved they should render them an account; and that, since there was a General chosen, they ought no longer to prolong their Session.

The Affembly on the other side, maintained, That they ought no account to any but to the Assembly general, from whom they derived their authority; that they ought to continue in fullpower, till a final determination of all affairs; that the General ought to have no other Council but themselves; and that to them belonged the sole management of the Finances; that they were Superiour to the particular Provinces, who had nothing to do to supervise their actions, nor had they power of themselves to summon any Conventions; and perswaded the Duke to interdict them, as themselves, before his arrival, had intended to have done: But he, seeing the Province of the Sevenes was already convened, and that the lower Languedoc was resolved upon the like course, endeavoured to get the Assemblies allowance of it, who instead of assenting to it, because they foresaw it would much impaire the continuation of their Session, resolved on other wayes to prolong it. And first of all they used all possible means to possess themselves of the Castle of Sommiers, backed by Berticheres, who pretended a right to it, and addressed themse'ves to Chastillon for his assistance: But defeated of their purposes by the diligence of the Duke of Rohan, and the Castle secured, they turn their applications to the Duke de Lesdiguieres, to whom they described the Duke to be an ambitious perfon, defirous to perpetuate the War, that he might continue his power; and declaring also, that they had rather submit to a peace with the King upon any terms, than to his Tyranny; and that if he intermedled further with them, he should be taught to know the limits of his power; But he refusing to hearken to them, and all their other attempts failing of the success they aimed at, they fend Deputies to the Sevenes, and the lower Languedoc, where the Duke was, who to prevent a further rupture (which proved a matter of great difficulty, so much were the Provinces of Languedoc incented against the Assembly) got them to allow of the actions of the Affembly of the five Provinces, to receive their Deputies into their protection; that there should be no peace concluded without provision for their security, but that they should forbear to Act as an Assembly, till the business were further determin'd by the Affembly general, to whom all parties were to fend their reasons; and that two Deputies of the Affembly of the five Provinces, should be of the Duke of Ruban's Council.

It is to be observed, that after the Duke's arrival at Montpellier, the Assembly that sate there a before his sace, dispessed absolutely of the Finances, and of all other affaires, made Laws, gavepass ports, and protections; and in all that time reserved nothing to his Council of War but one quarrel to be pieced up there; And when the Duke proposed to them a Convention of the States of all Languedoe to be held at Milland, to consult about the raising of money, and to provide for the administration of Justice, they stiffely withstood it, because they seared it was to abrogate their authority,

When they had occasion to send to the Assembly general, the Duke moved that they would fend joyntly with him and the other Provinces; but they were fill for several Deputations, being resolved to calumniate him, what they could; which they did sufficiently by their Envoy Babat a Minister, who recounted the wonders they did, before the Duke came among them, who had fince confounded all by his ambition; that, he pursued his own, at the expence of the publick Interest; that having ruined Foix, and Albigcois, he would do as much to the lower Languedoc, where he began to fix himfelf, and play Rex; that they were better fall into the hands of the King, and entirely submit to his will, than to be subject to this Duke; and that at it gith they should be faine to recall Chastillon: That they should beware of coming under the power of Soubize, who defired nothing more than the diffipation of the Assembly general, and had already written to the Duke, that it was composed only of seven or eight pitiful Rascals; and for conclusion, that if they would but impower them to continue their Seffion, they would curb the Duke well enough.

After the Convention of these Provincial Assemblies, the Duke of Rohaz, considering, on one side, the preparations made by the Duke of Montmorency to invade him, the Layes of the Duke of Gnise in Provence, for the same purpose, Chassillon's plots to undermine him, and the Levyes of the Duke de Lesdiguieres to invade Vivaretz; And on the other, the miserable condition he sound the Provinces, he came to serve in, by reason of the many needless armings Chassillon had made there, to the great discouragement of the Souldiery, and ruine of their siends. ty of recovering more, by reason of Aiguemortes, which interces pted their Commerce, he resolved with all speed to hasten his Levies.

Blaccons Lieutenaut of Vivaretz being in the mean while hard beset by the Duke of Lesdiguiers, sollicites the Duke of Roban for a supply of five hundred men, and withal, that he would make hafte to follow them with his whole forces: Those of Be-' darieux and Gignac, likewise demand some relief, for that the Duke of Montmorency had suprized Lunas, and forced Gressistac, both private houses, befieged Fougeres, and threatned also the above named places: The Duke, having no Forces on Foot, and two Armies upon his hands, excluding the Troops of Provence, goesto the Sivenes to try if he could thence pass five hundred men into Vivaretz; but at the straights near Villeneufve de Beig, were they repulfed, which obliged him to fend to the Duke of Lesdiguieres, to see if he could by any means retard his advance: But, notwithstanding his Remonstrances, and the dead of Winter besides, he continues his march with six thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse; to make a Bridge over the Rhone, between Bay and Poufin, belieges Poufin, and batters it, which abides his affault, Blaccons gets in to it, and behaves himself bravely in the storme; at length, the place being ready to be lost, by the mediation of him, whom the Duke of Rohan had fent to the Duke de Lesdiguieres, was yielded to him, upon condition, that if the peace (they were now in Treaty on) were not concluded, he should again restore it to those of the Religion; that he should forthwith withdraw his Army, and should not make any further attempts in Vivareix, nor Languedoc: And he for his part promised, as foon as possible, to fend the President Du Cros to proceed in the Treaty for a Peace.

The Province of Vivarets Assembled at Privas, approved of all, and wrote to the Duke of Roban, in favour of Blaccons, that he would confer on him the Government of Biy, which he granted.

The Duke; thus freed of the Army of Dauphine, thinks now of Victualling Gignac (which was well near starved, by reason of a Church well sortified, and strongly garison'd by the enemy, distant about a Musker shot from the Town, the whole Country round about them being enemies also) and advancing with his Army to oppose the progress of the Duke of Montmorency: In order to which he came to Montp Wer, where he presently sell sick of a Feaver, which lasted him sisten dayes; In the mean while the President Du Cros, that at the beginning of his Malady came to see him, was cruelly assassinated in the Town, and Berticheres, by his order, Vistualled Gognac.

Having recovered his health, about the beginning of March and speeded his Levies, he took the field, before he was well able to endure it, Berticheres made a motion to attach the Tower Charbonniere, that opening that passage they might have Salt by that way, and consequently money to defray part of the charges of the War; Saint Blancart, Governour of Peccaix, seconded the Proposition, so that, that designe was concluded on; Chastillon presently had notice of it, and the Duke of Roban was informed that Berticheres had faithfully promifed him that he would ruine all his troops: Wherefore the Duke resolved to refer this bustnesse to a farther debate; at which he urged against Berticheres the difficulty of the fiege; Saint Blancart thereupon stood up. and said, That unlesse they resolved on it, he would comply with Chastillon, there being otherwise no possibility of their subsistences so that he was constrained to yeild to it; and in the meane while he makes an attempt on Beaucaire, which succeeding not, by reason of the extream coldnesse, and tempestuousnesse of the night, it was executed in, he returned to the Tower Charbonniere, where he found that instead of advancing, they were driven off. and that they had suffered Chastillon to fortifie several intrenchments he had made upon a Causey, which at first might have easily been forced, but would now require more than a moneths time to take them. Moreover, they had drawn off those souldiers the Duke had lodg'd between Aiguemortes and Charbonniere; all which he well confidering, without imparting his resolution to Berticheres, sends to block up the Castle of Montlaur, that hindred the intercourse between Monipellier, and the Sevenes, and afterwards went in person to the siege of it, with intent to draw off the Duke of Montmo ency from Bedarieux, who spent so much time in taking of Fougeres that he could not come early enough before Montlaur was taken by affault.

Immediately after this action was over, the Duke de Lesdiguieres, impowered by the King, invites the Duke of Rohan to a perfonal Treaty for a Peace, which he assented to, leaving his Army under the command of Berticheres; At Laval, between Barjae, and Saint Esprit was their interview, where they agreed on Articles to be treated on, and the Duke of Rohan, in his own, and the name of the Provinces of his Division, appointed Calongues, Des-Isles, Dupuy of Montauban, Du Cros of Montpellier, and La Borée of Vivaretz for their deputies: Both he, and the Duke de Lesdiguieres joyntly advertise the Dukes of Boillon, Sully, Trimolithe, and Soubize, La Fo. ce also, and the Assembly general of this Treaty, that they might all send their Deputies to joyn with those of the Provinces; informing them withal, that as concerning Sauviure, and the places of Poieton, they could not conclude any thing, but must remit them to other things to be terminated by the King himfelf: We must now leave the Deputies on their journies, to take a View of what passed in the lower Languedoc.

The Duke of Rohan returned to his Army, which he found at Casicinau near Mentpellier; The Duke of Montmorency, with Chafillon, who was now joyned with him with his Gens-a' armes, or ho se men compleatly armed, and those of the Duke of Guise, which he had sent for out of Province, had besieged Courvousee, two leagues distant from Montpellier, which the Duke of Rohan had resolved to relieve, but the place being yeilded the next day, he encamped at Saint John de Vedas, and Salle-neuswe, and the Duke of Montmorency at La Veruve, Fabregues, and Saussan; a small river called Monsson only with their Canon one upon another, after which the Duke of Montmorency retires to Ville-neuswe a small Town upon the Lake. The Duke of Rohan the same day drew off to other quarters also, and in his march summoned Saussan in which was left a Garrison, which yeilded the next morn-

Berticheres, whether it was that he feared the loffe of his goods, or that he defired to ruine the Dukes Army, or that really he had received such intelligence, comes and tells the Duke, that for certain the Duke of Montmorcacy had passed the Lake, and was marching towards Saint Gilles, an Abbey belonging to Berticheres, and a very convenient place for a Magazine; befeeching him to allow him fifteen hundred foot, and an hundred horse to prevent him, and that according to the intelligence he should receive from him, the rest of the forces might be in a readinesse to follow him; which the Duke granted him; and in the meane while, with two thousand men he had lett, goes to besiege Saint Georges : But the Duke of Montmorency hearing that Sain Georges was befreged, and that the Duke of Rohan's army was divided, returns to relieve it, takes up his quarters at Saint John de Vedas, a league from Saint Georges, and by discharging of two piece of Canon, gives them a fignal of the succours he had brought, and that very night eftayed to put in two hundred mens who were briskly repulfed. The next day the Duke of Roban, leaving three hundred men to continue the fiege, made choice of a very advantageous place to fight in, and there stayed all the day; and in the interim, sent with all speed to Berticheres to command him back. That evening came Blacquiere to him, with a Regiment out of the Sevenes, and the next day Malauze, with fourfcore horse from the upper Languedoc, and Berticheres stayed not long behinde; so that the Duke being now three thousand soot, and three hundred horse strong, in the very sight of the Duke of Montmorency, raises his batteries, and takes the place, which was yeilded upon composition, the defendants lives only faved.

Berticheres was the second time like to have been the occasion of another great fault, by his obstinate affirming that the Duke of Montmorency was retreated to Ville-neufve, and had left five hundred men at the Bridge of Veruve, which might be eafily cut off: The Duke of Rohan was of a contrary opinion, averring, that if he himself were gone off, he would not have left those foot to the flaughter; the other defirous to evidence what he had affirmed, leads him towards the Bridge, where they found some forlorne parties of Musquetires in the ditches, which they soone made them quit: But Rohan perceiving that Berticheres had engaged a Regiment too far, commands all his forces, both horse and foot, to advance, and two field-pieces to be drawn after them; Berticheres closely pursues his designe, commands Elacquiere's Regiment to storme the trenches at the Bridge, and another Squadron to second them; But this being but an extempore project, and executed without any precedent deliberation, was also without successe: For Blacquiere, and his Serjeant Major Randon being flaine with Musquet shot, the whole party retreated in disorder; and at the same instant the Duke of Montmorency drew all his Army into Battalia, firing two field-pieces on our men; Roban made him the like return from his fide, and all the remaining part of that day was spent in Canenad's, and light skirmishes; the river Mousson still separating the Armies, who in the evening drew off to their quarters: There were ten or twelve flain on either fide; and the Duke of Montmerency the second time retired to Ville-neufwe; whence, leaving his Troops in Garrison in the adjacent places he went to Pezenas; which the Duke of Rohan having notice of, takes with him provision for two dayes, and with two Culverins marches that night to Gignac, blocks up the garrifon'd Church adjoyning to it, raifes his battery in the open day, and after the first Volley took it upon capitulation, and having demolished it, returns towards Montpellier; taking his way through the Valley of Montferrant, where he took and dismantled Mattelais, and other little places, and fortified Churches, which yeilded his fouldiers good booty, which was the reason that some of the Troops of the Sevenes, finding themselves so near home, for sook him.

Montpellier thus freed from the inconvenience of the enemies Garrisons, made Usez desirous of the like benefit. Thither the Duke of Rohan marches, and upon composition takes Cerniers, a Castle whose situation did indifferently secure it from any battery, and Saint Suffret by assault: But as he thought to have made a farther progresse, he was prevented by a request from the principal inhabitants of Nismes, to come to their Town, to suppresse a Sedition lately raised there; which with all diligence he did, leaving to Berticheres the charge of his Troops, the greatest part of which deserted their colours, so that there were not lest a thousand men together, Portes, having gotten together near two thousand men besieges Pruzillae, a paltry place, which had before been surrendred to Berticheres, who put in to it the Colonel Beauvois, who having handsomly desended it for two dayes, was at length forced, for want of powder, to give it up.

Chastillon at the same time comes before La Tour l'Abbs, near Peccaix, and belonging to Saint Blancart, which, either by the Cowardize or Treachery of Boulfauguet who commanded it, was within the space of twice sour and twenty hours, surrendred; So that Roban, who had rallyed some troops for that end, had not leafure to relieve it, nor means any longer to keep his forces together, with which he had marced up and down for three moneths tegether without any pay, and made many sieges, both by reason of the restactoriness of his Colonels, and the approaching harvesty a scalon, in which the poor of the lower Languedoc gaine their whole Subsistence.

To return to Nilmes, It is to be observed that Brison had been protected and gratified by the Duke of Rohan more than any other, out of hopes he had to win him that way: But he, being of a nature on which no obligations could prevail, ingrateful, and prefumptuous, had, notwithstanding [designed to possesse himself of Nismes, to make his own conditions withal; pretending a most transcendent zeal to their cause, and losing no opportunity to asperse the Duke with calumnies, openly declaring that he had betrayed Poufin to the Duke de Lesdiguieres, and was the sole cause of the losse of Vivaretz. He conspired also with the Deputies of the Assembly of the five Provinces, who, instead of returning to their own homes, went from town to town irritating the people against the Duke of Roban; and having now made sure of Brison, and his affiftance in Ni mes were refolved upon the first opportunity to reassemble there to oppose the authority of the Duke of Roban, who being informed that they were all met at Nismes, with intention to begin again their Assembly, sent one of his Gentlemen to forbid them, and to command the Deputies of Vivaretz to return to their Province, shewing them withal the Deposition of Babat, wherein the Deputies had most basely scandalized him, which Brison stoutly opposed; but found not the people any way inclineable to be led by his passion; So that, the Deputies were forced forced to be gone, and Brifon to wait upon the Duke to excuse this procedure.

Whil'st he was upon his journey, the principal inhabitants of Nifmes, making good use of his absence, took occasion to procure a Declaration of the general Council of the Town, that the Government of Brison was no longer supportable, that Roban should be requested to approve of this result of their deliberations, and that they might be permitted to live under the fole authority of their own Consuls, till a more urgent necessity should require a Governour, and that then they would accept of any one he should please to place over them; and that he would with all speed repair to their town to prevent any disorders might survene : Whereupon he went thither, and there approved of and ratified this act of their Council. At the same time was there held an Assembly at Ni (mes to take order for the securing of their harvest; to whom Brifoz addressed his complaints; But the Assembly waved them, and approved of the determination of the Council, and the Dukes confirmation of it: Brifon feeing he could not this way arrive at his aimes, goes to Mompellier, and in all places endeavours to stir up the people against the Duke of Rohan, attempting also by means of his Confederates to raise a sedition in Nismes; which the Duke having notice of, fends the Lieutenant of his Guards with a command to arrest him, where ever he should find him, him in Usez.

When Nismes was thus secured, order was taken for the levying, and paying of a sufficient number of Souldiers to preserve the Countreys about Menipellier, Nismes, and Usez from the spoyle, and ravage, the Duke of Montmoreney had orders from the King to make in those parts, and also to send some supplies to Mon-who, after some time spent in the search of him, at length arrests tauban.

After the holding of this Affembly, it was thought fit that another should be convened in the Sevenes for the same cause; and forasimuch as the Duke of Montmorency already began to burne, and waste the places near Montpellier, Roban to prevent farther mischief, lest Laudez his Quartermaster-General with a Brigade of horse: upon the first approaches of Montreal Major-General to the Duke of Montmorency, at a contest about a Farme-house, the Adjutant seeing his son too far engaged, goes with some Musquetires to disengage him, whereupon Montreal charges him with above an hundered horse; but Laudez came very opportunely to his rescue, charged, and wounded Montreal with his own hand, made him site, and pursued him sighting up to his own body, which was in so tottering a condition, that had Saint Andre the King's

76 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book II.

King's Lieutenant of Montpeller made use of that opportunity to charge them, he had utterly routed the whole party.

We must now return to the otherside of the Loire, and the Deputies the Duke of Roban had fent to the Court: Those that were defirous of Peace, endeavoured to keep the King at Paris to expect those Deputies, of whose speedy arrival the Duke de Lesdiguires had given notice; for that the Chancellour, and the President Finin, who were unsit for travel, could not otherwise be present at the Council, nor consequently be able to withstand the violent motions of those who were inclined to a prolongation of the warre, which they perceiving, omitted no inventions to withdraw the King from Paris, and on Palm-Sunday carried him by stealth, out at a back gate of the Louvie, just as if they were running away with him, to keep his Easter at Orleans; whence, without staying for the Queen-Mother, he goes down the River as far as Nantes; the fortunate successe of the Duke of Soubize obliged him to take this course; who with two thousand men, in the middest of all the Dike d' Espernon's forces, in Xiintonge, and Angoulmois, of the Count de Rochefousaults in Pictou, and Saint Lukes in the Islands had seized and fortified the Isle of Oleron, taken Royan, the Tower of Mournac, Saugeon, and several other places, totally defeated Saint Luke's Regiment, and at noone-day forced Li Chame, and took Les Sables: In thort, he struck so great a terror into the Countrey, that had not the King's arrival prevented him, he had absolutely made himself Master of the fild : But before the arrival of the Duke of Robin's Deputies, the condition of affairs in Pietru being much altered by the defeat of Riez, the retaking of Royan, and the Treaty commenced by La Foice, they were remitted to the Queen-Mother, who stayed at Nantes, and from thence to the Chancellour at Paris, so that they returned without having effected any thing: The King keeping on his way in Guienne, concludes the Treaty with La Force, who for a Marshal of France his staff, and two hundred thousand crowns gave up Saint Foy, which he had injuriously gotten, and detained from Terbon Pardaillan's fon in law: And he, and his fons gave up all the Of-Aces, and Governments they enjoyed, without the privity of the Affembly general or the Duke of Rohan.

While this Treaty was in agitation, Tonacins, after a handfome defence, was furrendred to the Duke d' Elbeuf; and LuZigaza made a particular composition for Cleras, which he yielded also, so that the King came to Saint Antonin without any other opposition: The Inhabitants of Montauban, mindful of the good Offices they had received from those of Saint Antonin, though they feared they should disfurnish themselves of Souldin

ers, sent thither Saint Sebastien a Captain in Beauson's Regiment, with what Souldiers they could spare to command the place: But his being mortally wounded, in an assault made upon some out-works, which were carried by main force, together with the springing of some Mines, so terristed the Inhabitants, that in great consulting, and so suddenly yielded they the Town, that two hundred men, which they desired from Montauban, conducted by Salce, and Rousselfeliere found the place taken, where they were quietly let in by the enemy who stabbed many of them, before the rest could perceive that the place was lost. But at length discovering their error, they saved themselves the best they could; Salce and Rousseliere were taken, and not released but by the Articles of Peace.

Those of Montauban fearing that from Saint Antonin the next visit would be to them, follicited the Duke of Roban for a Governour, and some supplies of men, who sent them Saint Andre de Montbrun, who with great courage, and equal fortune made way for himself and five Hundred Men into the Town.

The King's approach to the higher Languedo e greatly difheartned the whole party, and gave those that were false among them an occasion to renew their intelligences; Every Town in particular, sent the same harsh message to the Duke, that unless he presently repair thither, the whole Countrey will be given up. This cast him into many anxious perplexities; for if he goes not whither he is called, the Countrey is lost; and if he does go, he leaves the lower Laugu dos to a manifest hazard, where his absence would give Chastilloa an opportunity to revive his factions and conspiracies: And on the other side the Duke de Lesdiguienes presses him with reiterated summons to a second interview: At length he resolves to relieve those that were most necessitated, excuses himself to Lesdiguieres, sends a renfort of Souldiers to Mon pellier, to preferve their fields from ravage, by reason that the Duke of Montmorency had received a recruit of five Troops of light Horse, which Zamet brought him from the King's Army, and gives order for the levying of a thousand men for the higher Languedoc; whither as he was going with his own attendants only, Chauve, Minister of the Church of Sommiers, a man of exemplary piety, and fingular elequence, comes to him at Sains Fohn de Gardonnenque, and tells him that he knew, and that by very good information, that Chastillon, much displeased with himself for his former actions, was fore troubled to see the imminentruine of those of the Religion, whom, but for the af-Fronts he had received, he had never deserted; and was confident.

dent, that if he were handsomely dealt with, he would return again to the party, to the great advantage of it, both by reason of the confideration of his person, especially in Languedoc, and of the consequence of the Town of Aiguemortes, which was in his hands. This was a device of Chastillon's confederates, who, knowing the reputation of this Minister, had abused him with these hopes, that the Dukes refusal to admit of him, might furnish them with more specious pretences on which to ground their detractions and new calumnies against him; which the Duke very well foreseeing, answers, That he was so farre from diverring his good intentions, or hindring a work of fo general concernment, as the regaining such a person to their party, that, on the contrary, in any thing tending to their advantage, he would meet him more than half way: As for the command conferred on him, by reason of the other's absenting himself from the Province, as he had never fued for it, so neither was he fo fond of it, as not to yield it up, whenever the Province that gave it him should think fit to revoke it; and that he wished with all his heart, that he would feriously and in good earnest. comply with his duty to his own, and the publick Interests; that for his parc, he was contented with the command affigned him by the general Assembly at Rochell, in the upper Guienne, and the upper Languedoc, whither he was now going to provide against the dangers the King's approach gave them cause to feare, leaving the way open for Chaftillon to return to those he had before forfaken: However the duty he owed both to his imployment, and conscience, obliged him to say, that there were yet many things in this case to be considered, and that the Province ought maturely to weigh, and every one in particular strictly to examine the importance and consequences of this affair, and principally Chauve himself, both by reason of his profession, and the charge he had now undertaken: But that the infallible tryal of his fincerity would be, whether he would effectively deliver up into the hands of the Province, the Town of Aiguemortes; for that if his pretences to serve the party were real and sincere, he would make no difficulty of it, but if feigned and fallacious, he would never dif-polfesse himself of it: Chauve very well approved the motion, believing he would accept of it; and so returned.

The Duke foreseeing that in his absence this business would be moved again, gave an especial charge to Dupay (whom he lest his Agent in that Province) to take great heed, that nothing passed there, to the prejudice of the publick or his Interest; to which end he gave him sufficient power, and instructions, tending,

ding chiefly to this, that if this proposition were started in any Assembly whatsoever, and that they should proceed to Treat on it without the precedent condition, to wit, that the Garison of Aiguemortes should be first restored to the disposal of the Province, he should oppose it; and if they Treated on those termes, he should see that there were no foul play used, and that nothing were concluded without a previous performance of that condition.

This done, he proceeds in his journey to the higher Langue-doc, and arrives there just upon the taking of Saint Antonin, and so opportunely, that he prevented the Rendition of Lombez and Realmont, and revives the drooping and almost decayed spirits of the whole Countrey, in which he lost nothing but Carmaing, Saint Espuel, and Cucq; the first by treachery, the other two by reason of their weakness were quitted by the inhabitants, and afterwards fired, as the Army marched by.

The King seeing, that the Countrey resumed their courages, advances surther, carried on with the hopes the Duke of Mont-morency and Chastillon gave him, and chiefly of Montpellier, sending all his Ammunition down the Rhone to the lower Languedoc; Blaccors revolt, who sold Ease to the King for twenty thousand Crowns, having opened the passage of that River: The Duke of Roban on the other side gets before them, and enters Montpellier at the same time the King got into Beziers; leaving a thousand Foot with Malauze to assist him against the Duke of Vendosme, whom the King had left with an Army in the higher Languedoc, as he had also the Marshal Themines with other Troops about Montauban.

About the same time came a Gentleman to the Duke of Roban, from the Duke of Bouillon, with credential Letters, inporting also his resentments of the miseries of those of the Religion; that he thought a Peace would have been concluded at Saint Fohn; and afterwards at Montauban, that, fince that he understood that he and the Duke de Lesdiguieres were in Treaty about it, that he advised him to conclude it upon any terms, provided it were general; for that being not able to dispute the field with the King, for want of forraign affistance, their destruction, though it might be retarded, would yet be inevitable, and that the longer the peace was deferred, the more disadvantageous would it be: Nevertheless if it was our ruine, that they had inalterably decreed, that he would take the field with what forces he could make, to affift the party by a confiderable diversion of the enemy; that he was in Treaty with Count Mansfeld, and that he defired three things of the Duke : First, that he would

impower him to Treat with Forraigners: Secondly, that he, and the Provinces under his command, should oblige themselves to bear an equal share of the charge of the Levyes: Thirdly, that no Peace should be concluded without him; all which Propositions were assented to, and the Gentleman returned well satisfied, having also received a faithful assurance, that if the peace were not made by the first of September, it should not be concluded without him, provided that within the time limited he were certified of his acceptance of the conditions. In the absence of the Duke of Rohan from the lower Languedoe, the Council of that Province, composed at that time of the Deputies of the three Towns of Montpellier, Nilmess and Ulez, imagining that fince Saint Aronin was taken, they might be the next the King would invade, and that though the fort fications of Montpellier were already well advanced, yet was it unprovided of men and provisions, conceived it necessary to affemble the whole body of the Province, to order all; and Lunel was the place designed for the Assembly to be kept at; where when all the Deputies with Dupuy were met, and had debated, and resolved on what concerned the victualling and securing of Montpellier, and other places in case they should be besieged; the adherents of Chastillo1, of which there were many present, having made their party, thinking to make their advantage of this opportunity, produced agains the Articles for his re-establishment: The Deputies of the three Towns, voluntarily, and of themselves opposed this overture, for fear of falling into the hands, and under the command of one, they had so highly offended, by devesting him of his charge; Protesting to the Assembly, that if they assumed any other debate than what concerned the executing of the Decrees already past, for the relief of Montpellier, and other places, they would utterly defert them, and defavow all their fature determinations; Dupuy in obedience to the command he had received, seconded this opposition, which Berticheres (Moderator of the Assembly, as being the Duke's Lieutenant General) also much countenanced, alledging, that they had no power ro Assemble, in the absence, and without the permission of their General; and that though they were now convened, yet was it with his good leave and approbation, and upon the present exigency of affairs, of which they had given him an account, and that this necessity being now taken off, they ought to forbear the debate of other particular matters, till his return.

Nevertheless the confederates aforesaid resolutely persisted in their design, renforcing every day their sollicitations, with hopes to produce at length a resumption of the suspended debate, and to carry it by plurality of voices, or at least by this means to take off Lunel, Aimargues, and Mauguio, which adhering to Chastillon, would raise his esteem at Court; of which when the Deputies of the three Towns, and Dupuy had notice, they refolved, that at the first mention of it, they would object the interest of the Province of the Sevenes, which being a part of the Generality of the lower Languedoc, it must needs be prejudicial to the common repose of both the Provinces, to determine that affair, without the others intervention or privity; wherefore they fent a true account of all that had passed to the Council of that Province then sitting at Anduze, together with their advice concerning what they conceived ought to be done by them in the behalf of their Province: The same Deputies also, with Dupuyo went to Berticheres to make fure of him, who faithfully promifed to continue immoveable in his opposition. In the succeeding Sefsions there were still some words thrown out by Chastillon's friends, concerning that subject, but they passed unregarded. In the mean while came the Deputies from the Assembly of the Province of the Sevenes, who made a large Remonstrance of the injuries their Province would receive from the change they would introduce in their proceedings, that it was an unheard of procedure, and that their Province could never suffer, that that of Languedoc, should by it self presume to abrogate the Decrees of the Assembly of the Circle, or five Provinces, in which the Deputies of the Assembly of the Sevenes had a joynt concurrence of Votes with those of the lower Languedoc; and moreover represented to the Assembly their own Interests, and the inconveniences would enfue their submitting themselves to the power and conduct of a man, whom they had so highly provoked, by the suspicions they had of him; and in the last place protested, That in case the Assembly should proceed further, in the absence of the Duke of Rohan, or without his consent and approbation, they would absolutely disclaim them.

This opposition of the Deputies of the Council of the Sevenes, seconded by those of the three Towns, grounded upon their own, and the large Commission, and power of Dupuy something cooled the heat of those sollicitours, which yet in a short time after they resumed again; and importuned Chauve anew, to prosecute what he had begun; which he would by no means undertake, without imparting it to Dupuy; who after he had remembred him, upon what terms he had parted with the Duke of Rohas at Saint John de Gardonaenque, tells him that he would consider of it, and then give him his answer; and in the mean time had a conference about it with the Deputies of the three Towns, who thought it not unfit that Chauve, as of himself, and without any particular Commission, should found Chastillor's inclinations, to discover whether he would yield to that condition of delivering up Aiguemortes into the hands of the Province, which was then very opportunely met, to receive both it, and him, with all assurance he could defire of an Amnesty, and the continuance of their respects to him: It being most apparant, that Chastillon, who they knew defired nothing more than to intrude himself among us, only to render himself more considerable, and his Interests more favoured at Court, would never disfurnish himself of the only means left him, to procure a performance of the promises made him, and that thus they should also make him defist from his pursuit. When they had given Chauve their answer in these termes, he approved of it; and promifed to comport himself according to their directions; and thereupon had a conference with Banfillow the Minister of Aiguemortes, who highly magnified the advantages this re-establishment of Chastillon would produce to their party in general: To whom Chauve replyed, That it would be impossible to esface the impressions Chastillon's procedures had left in the whole Province, unless he supplied them with the means he had in his hands, by yielding up the Town of Aiguemortes to their disposal; which if he would do, they would evidence the contentment they had, to see a person of his quality return into the way from which he had digressed, by their promptness to serve and honour him, as they had formerly done: This discourse pleased not Banfillon at all, who told him, that he conceived that Chastillon neither would, nor ought to confent to this Proposition; that he had good reason to take heed of falling into those snares he knew were spread for him; for that having devested him of all power, they might the more easily dispose of him at their pleasure, or at least pay all his former service with the cold recompence of Oblivion, or neglect; and that therefore he conceived the Treaty absolutely broken: Upon which, as Chanve was about to leave him, he told him, that he would give Chastillen an account of all, and him an answer the next day at the same place; which he did, and in effect conformable to his own preconceptions; which absolutely cleared the judgement of Chauve, and many others also, when he had given the Assembly a Summary of this conference.

In the mean while the Deputies of the three Towns incessantly sollicited Dupuy, to press the Duke of Roham's return, representing to him the condition of the Province, and the danger it was in of being ruined by the divisions sprung from this late Proposition, and the delay his absence occasioned in the progress of Their affaires: Whereupon Dupty resolved, to make a journey himself to the Duke of Roban: But yet he would not leave the affembly, before he had gotten a promise from Berticheres, that there should be no more mention made of the aforesaid re-establishment for eight dayes, by which time he should return a gain from Nismes whither he pretended he was going; but in the mean time he goes by great journeys towards the Duke, whom he sound at Pout de Camares, who having received from him an account of all passages, quitted all other things to return with all possible speed to the lower Languedoc: When he was come to Mirveis, he sent a Gentleman, with command to travel night and day to the Assembly, to let them know that he was within two days journey of them, and desired them to suspend all further debates concerning their assages.

This unexpected news surprized the Assembly so, that inflead of continuing their consultations, they went to meet him as farre as Sommieres, where when he had learned of them, what order they had taken for the raising of Souldiers, and supplying the Garisons with necessaries, he ratified what they had done, and se dismissed them.

Thus ended this tentative of Chastillon's friends to restore him to a repute with the Party: After which Roban went to Montpellier, where he turned fifteen or sixteen of his chiefest Confidents out of the Town, and ordered all things necessary (as before he had done at Montauban) for a siege, both for aumunition, victue als, and the fortifications.

It is to be observed, that in the Duke's absence, Americ the fust Consul of Montpellier, and Cartineas his Kinsman, took cccasion upon a defeat of two or three companies, near to Perolles, which Saint And e had fent thither, while the enemy was plundering the Countrey thereabouts, to accuse him to the people, who had already a jealousie of him; and Berticheres, thoug his father-in-law, instead of assisting him, helped to thrust him out of the Town; not out of any affection to the cause, but of a pestilent ambition raigned among them; every one labouring to raise his own advantages upon the ruines of others, and better their conditions by delivering Montpellier to the King: But the seventeen dayes stay the Duke made there, and the discovery he made, by a Messenger of the President Faure, taker neare Ni/m's, that Berticheres Treated with the King, together with some Colonels, who were ordered for the defence of Monipellier; and the execution of Bimart, who was one of them, reduced things to a better posture; But yet these disorders rerarded the Levyes, so that of source thousand Souldiers design84 The Memoiresof the Duke of Rohan Book H ed for the defence of the Town, they got in but fifteen handred.

It is moreover to be noted, that the Duke of Rohan seeing the great want of Ammunicion in the Province of lower Languedoc, and of time, and means to fortifie all their Garisons, proposed the dismantling of them, and the reducing of their forces to Mon pellier, Nistans, lister, and Sommieres; which the people then rejected, but have since, though too late, repented it; for their obstinacy drew upon them the loss both of their Estates and Liberties; for whiles they vainly trified away their time and labour, in fortifying so many places, neither of them was fortified or desended as it ought, but both they, and the reliefs sent to them, which in the other places would have been of great use, were now made wholly unserviceable.

The King seeing that the care and diligence of the Duke of Rohan had descated all the designes of those that would have delivered up Monigellier to him, staid some time at B. ziers to expect his Ammunitions, and to recruit his Army: And in the mean time sent the Mutshal de Prassin to besiege Bedaricux; which he took, and dismantled; and then sent the Duke of Montymo ency to take in Mauguio, which the inhabitants knew not how to defend, nor yet would they quit it, nor spoyle the wines, as the Duke of Rohan had commanded them.

The Prince of Condé about this time came to the King's Army, and thence went to besiege Luncl and Massillargues, within half a League one of another, and sufficiently stored with all necessaries, there being in Lunel two Colonels besides the Governour, who all joyntly wrote to the Duke of Rohan, that if he would send them in but five hundred Souldiers, they would give a handsome account of the place: The Duke, when he had setled Calonges in Montpellier, and lest Dupuy his Agent there, in his name to provide all things requifite for the defence of the Town, went surposely to prepare the defired supply, and sent t'rem in eight hundred men; but much to their regret; for the n xt day, though they had not suffered any the least extremity, and that the breach made was not confiderable, they yielded riemselves with all their Arms, and Baggage. Those of Massil-Ligues had done the like but a few dayes before: But the Articles of Luiet were violated even before the Prince of conde's face; for when the Garison marched out, they were beaten, disarmed, stript, and a great part of them killed or maimed; and in this lamentable posture went they to Nismes and Sommieres, on which they brought so great a terror, that upon the appearance of the enemy before Sommieres, in which there were fifteen hundred men, they did even as bad as those of Lunci; and, which is a most shameful thing to be related, the Captains took two thou-fand Crowns, to leave their arms to the enemy.

The Town of Nismes alarmed by these sad accidents, sent Messengers to request a visit from the Duke of Rohan, which he willingly condescended to, but first got together as many Souldiers as he could at Anduze, which he left under the Command of Charce his Lieutenant General in the Sevenes, and of the Adjutant General, who when they faw the Duke of Montmorency return to the Sevenes, drew into a body about a quarter of a League from Anduze, at a Pass not easily accessible, which they fortified; and had not their care and diligence in furnishing Sauve and Aletz with two valiant and expert Commanders, and a thoufand, or twelve hundred Souldiers, drawn out of Saint Hyppolite, and the places adjacent prevented it, those two Towns had been also lost: So that the good posture they were in, together with the Duke of Roban's obstructing of Montmo ency's provisions, which came a great way off, forced him, after a successeless voyage, to return again.

In the mean time the Marshal Themines plundred all the Countrey about Montauban, burnt all their Countrey houses, and obstructed their Vintage: But all this hindred not Saint Andre de Montbeun, their Governour, from drawing out his Canon, and battering, and taking many Castles, among others, Renie, and La Bassida, and storing his Town with Corne and Wine for a whole yeare: He had also several Skirmishes with the Garifon of Montech, and others also, and still came off with honour and advantage.

The Duke of Vendosme also with seven thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse, sate down before Lombez; Malauze comes to Realmont with intention to relieve it; but conceiving it not tenable against such a force, by reason of the weakness of the Town, and that the Castle which commanded it, was Garison'd by the enemy; contented himself after a long Skirmish, withdrawing off the Souldiers, as well inhabitants, as strangers; and abandons the town, which was burnt. From Lombez the Duke marches to besiege Briteste, alittle place, weak of it self, and commanded almost on every side: Thither Malauge sent five hundred men under the Command of Faucon, one of Sesigny's Captains, who behaved himself very gallantly: He endured the Siege a month or more, beat them off in four or five assaults, was twice relieved with fresh supplies of men and powder, by Malauze, whose main body lay at Saint Paul and Miatte, abouca League and half from Bitteffe', and never had more than 16 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book II.

two thousand Foot, and two hundred Voluntiers on Horse-back, with whom, and by the means of the brave resistance of the befreed, he did so well, that the Duke of Vendasme, being commanded by the King to come, and joyn his Porces with the Army that lay before Montpellier, raised the siege after he had spent two thousand Canon bullets on them, and lost sisteen hundred of his men; and those within the town three hundred.

The departure of this Army, freed the whole Country from much harm, and greater fears; and invites us to return to the lover Languedoc, where the Duke de Lesdiguieres, having exchanged his Religion for the honour to be made Constable of France, conceiving himself more capable now, than heretofore. procure a Peace, follicites the Duke of Roban to another interview, who seeing the hopes he had grounded on the Count Mansfield, who was gone into Holland, had failed him, the more willingly complies with his defires. They met at Saint Piiwas, where they agreed on all things, except the King's entry into Manipellier; whereupon he obliged the Duke to a journey to the Town, to propose it to them, with all possible assurances, they shou'd desire, to testifie, that they intended not the least infringement of their liberties: But this to be done without any ceffation of Arms, nor was the Duke allowed more than two dayes flav there, to perfect this negotiation; who, confidering the danger Montpellier was in, unless supplied with a new renfort of Souldiers; for that the works being not finished, their defects were to be made up with an addition of more men, fends express Orders to his Adjutant General Sorle, to draw twelve hundred men, out of the two thousand he had with much adoc detained at Anduze, and by the Valley of Montferrant conduct them to Montpellier, the night enfuing the evening that he should get in there: But when the Captains and Souldiers knew that they were to be locked up in Montpellier, they all deferted the Adjutant, who came thither accompanied only with fi teen.

These of Montpelier would by no means admit of the Proposition concerning the King's entry into their Town, searing a suppression of their liberties, by reason of the Prince of Conde's animalities against them; which the Duke perceiving, encourages them to stand bravely upon their defence, assuring them that he would provide for their relief, in which, for his part, he omitted nothing that might soward it: But as there is a vast difference between the promises, and payment of money, so instead of ten days, within which time he thought to have sent them aid, not within and in his journeys to Nism s, Micz, and the Scuenes, not without manifest hazard of his person, could he not, under five weeks, get four thousand men together; nor those neither without engaging himself by promises to most of the Captains; that they were not to be fent to Montpellier, but only that the confideration of their numbers might procure them a more advantageous Peace: So great was their consternation; and those that were desirous to get thither, were yet deterred by the apprehension of the difficulties, which really were very great; the King having then an Army confisting of twenty thousand Foot, and three thousand Horse; for the Constable, and the Duke of Vendosme had now joyned their's with the other Forces; besides, so great a way were they to go, and such difficult pasfes had they to get through, that it was impossible to approach within three Leagues of the Town, without encountring the King's whole Cavalry; and moreover so great a scarcity was there of Proviisions, that they could not keep the Troops together, more than eight or ten dayes: Those of Montpellier of the other fide, could no longer subsist for want of men, by reason of the excessive duty they were on, and therefore every moment sent they most important Letters for relief: To which may be added also a new Summons sent him by the Constable, who had before lest the Court in some discontent for that he could not prevaile to obtain a Peace; yet now at his return was he in higher esteem, both by reason of the Forces he had brought with him, and that the Prince, in his absence, had nothing advanced the Siege: All which the Duke confidering, and that he was utterly destitute of hopes of any Forraign assistance, having newly received a Letter from the King of England pressing him to conclude a Peace, and feeing no probability of any good to be done at home; every one being weary of the War, and labouring to purchase his own particular safety, with the expence of the publick Interest; that the first Town should fall off, and embrace a particular Treaty, would totally frustrate all endeavours for a general Peace; that the least cross accident should happen to Montpellier, or the relief intended for it, would be irreparable; that the King could not want men, the Duke of Angoulesme being then at Lions with a recruit of eight, or ten thousand; and that, without a miracle, Montpellier could not be preserved: Moreover, seeing that there were about the King two powerful parties; the one preffing the conclusion of a Peace, the other, the continuation of the War; and that the former could not subsist without a Peace, no more than the other without a War; and that the Chief of the latter, to wit, the Prince of Conde had deserted the Court upon the Composure of former differences GA

he conceived that those that promoted the Peace being alwayes neare the King, would take care to see it faithfully observed: This made him resolve upon another conference with the Constable, at which the Duke of Chevreuse was present; where all was concluded according to the Declarations and Breviates drawn up to that purpose: Which when the King acquainted the Prince of Condé with, he less the Court; and the Duke of Roban, with the Deputies of the Sivenes, Nismes, and Usez, went to Morp Wier, where they all confirmed the Peace; the substance of the principal Articles of which was, as followeth:

1. A Confirmation of the Edict of Nantes, and of all Declarations and Articles Registred in the Parliaments.

2. A restoring of both the Religions to the places, where they were formerly exercised.

3. A re-establishment of the seats of Justice, Offices of the receipts, and Officers of the Finances to those places and towns where they were before the troubles, except the Chamber of the Edict of Guienze, to Nerac.

- A Confirmation of all Judgements, giver by Judges of the Religion, Conflicted by the Superiours of the Party; both in Civil, and criminal matters.

THE

Memoires

DUKE of ROHAN:

The third Book.

Containing a Relation of the second Warte against those of the Resormed Religion in France.

He Peace thus concluded, the Prince gone from the Court, and his Faction, by his absence, and the death of the Cardinal de Retz quite decayed, every one began to have fair hopes of its continuance, and that, grown wise by our former miscarriages, we should now renounce all suture thoughts of Civil broyles, and mind

the Protection of the ancient Allyes of the Crown: But the beams of favour now reflecting folely on Puizieux, a man of a hot spirit, and whose whole ingenuity consisted in tricks and fallacies, he became more studious of his own, than his Masters geatnesse (a vice incident to all favourites) being carefull to raise himself some props at Rome, and very unwilling to give Spaine the least disgust;

So that all Leagues with other forraigne Princes, were made with fuch respect to those two powers, as if we stood in sear of their displeasure: Nay, and to sooth the Popes Nuncio, who had alwayes opposed the Peace, at the very beginning of it, would undertake to shew him, that it was not made to abate the presecution, but to promote the ruine of those of the Reformed Religion-For immediately after the King's entry into Montpellier, the fense of the general Grant was inverted in most places of it, notwithstanding the several Remonstrances the Duke of Rohan made to oppose it: Nor were the Souldiers drawn away from Montpellier, though promifed to be done immediately after the King's departure; then was it put off, till his return from Provence, then, till he came to Avignon, and lastly till he should be at Lians; whence the Duke of Rohan having followed him to all those places, urging their departure very earnestly, and perhaps too boldly, telling the King they should defist from farther razing the fortifications, if he revoked that command, returned with a Letter to Valence, commanding him expressly to do it. Nor did they forbear in their march through Dauphine to seize upon all the places that were in the hands of those of the Religion, though they had served the Kings party, the only recompence they had for fighting against their consciences, nor were any but those only, that were possessed by the Constable, exempt from this violence, which yet he preferved with much difficulty, for had not the Marshal Crequi engaged to deliver them up after his death, they had then gone the Tame way with the rest. At Lions the Deputies of Ruchelle came to wait mon the King, whence they carried back Letters to Amud Governour of Fot Lewis, commanding him, that within eight dayes after the Rochellers had performed what the Articles had en-Joyned them, as concerning the demolition of their fortifications, he should cause the said Fort to be slighted also: but Amaud received another of the same date, but a cleare contrary fence.

When the King went from Lione, towards Paris, the Duke of Roban returned to Languedge, really and fincerely to execute, what ever had been promifed in the name of those of the Religion, touching that part of their fortifications they ought to flight. Going to Montpellier, he found the Confulate of the Merchants changed, of which he complains to the Court, but in vaine: He delivers the Kings Letter to Valence, who promifed to obey it; from thence he goes to Nifmes and Usez, whom he presently sets on work; thence to the higher Linguedge, Montauban, Foix, and Rovergue, where are conference with the Duke of Ventadour, the Count of Carmaine, the President de Caminade, and the Count of Aquien

d' Aquien, Commissioners, as he was for the demolishing the fortifications, all things were agreed on between them and he for his part instantly set about them, delivering up also all Forts, and Towns that had been taken in the Warre, restoring also the execise of the Ramish Religion to those places, where it had been formerly used.

Notwithstanding all which Valence, who, besides the four thoufand men were in Montpellier, had four or five Regiments mere, and three or four troops of light horse, had defigned to surprize, with these the Sevenes under pretence of taking up quarters there, and by means of some correspondencies he had gotten among them; of which when the Duke had notice, from the principal Communalties of the Sevenes, who fent him their complaints of this infringement of the Peace, he wrote to them back again for answer, that he knew it was not the Kings pleasure, and therefore that they should not receive them; and to Valence that he should for bear those quarters till his arrival, least otherwise it should prejudice the establishment of the Peace: The Duke of Ventadour, the Count de Carmaine, and the President de Caminade wrote to him to the same effect; which he regarded not, but proceeded in his enterprise, the Towns of Sauve, and Gange receiving his Troops, but all the other places, upon the Duke of Robin's Letter refused them: The Duke when he had put things in fuch a forwardnesse in the higher Languedoc, returns to Montpellier according to the agreement between him, and Valencé: But he was no sooner entred the Town, than made a Prisoner, and kept with a fevere guard upon him: This caused a great aftenishment in many, who could not imagine that this should be done without order; but being known at Court, it was not approved of there, for fear lest it should prove too great an obstruction to the raising of the fortifications; so that his liberty was presently ordered.

Whiles the Duke was under this restraint, Valence, contrary to the Articles of the Peace, divides the Consulate of Montpellier between those of the Religion and the Papists, and to effect it, iffed all manner of violence to the old Consuls, detaining them as prisoners one whole night in his own lodgings.

The Court gave the Duke of Rohm no better fatisfaction concerning this, than the former breach of the Peace; receiving, inflead of relief, advice that to avoid the sufficient the lower Languedoe had of him, he should remove to the higher, to execute the remaining part of his Commission: For Puysicux brother-in-law to Val nee, having cashiered Schamberg, and restored the Chancellour his Father, was now the only powerful man, and by drawing drawing false glosses upon all the actions of Valence improved them all to his advantage, and upon all occasions thwarted the affairs of the Duke of Rohan, clouding all his attempts with injurious and sinister interpretations and jealousies: And yet upon the answer the Duke sent that he would not leave Nismes, nor the Sevenes till they were rid of those Troops that lay upon them, he quickly received an order to dismisse them: After which he departed towards the lower Languedoe, leaving those of Nismes very much unsatisfied of him, out of a persuasion that he was of intelligence with the Court, and privite to all the violations of the Peace, and that his imprisonment was not real, but a delusory trick to palliate his other practices; The usual recompence persons of quality and honour derive from services done to the people.

When he came to Millaud he was informed, that the Duke d' Espernou had written to all the Towns held by those of the Religion in Rouergue, to send him Deputies both of the one, and the other Religion, and that they should not proceed to the Election of their Consuls, (who are usually chosen at whitsuride) before they had from him known the King's pleasure therein; this caused a great consustion among them; but by the advice of the Duke of Roban they proceed, notwithstanding, to their Elections, at the accustomed time, according to the Declaration of Peace, which imports, that in the Consulary Towns, held by those of the Religion, nothing shall be innovated; and then sent their Deputies to the Duke d' Espernon to know what his pleasure was: Avoiding by this means, the injury intended to the Peace, and them in this particular.

This done, he goes to Castres, where he fixes his residence, and thence fends the King a perfect account of the entire execution of his Commission; humbly befeeching him, that, according to his Royal promise, the disgarrisoning of Montpellier, the demolition of the Fort Lewis, and the re-establishing of the Chamber (or Court erected in favour of those of the Reformed Religion) at Castres, might be no longer deferred: But instead of receiving Justice. thereupon, contrary to the Act of Pacification, verified in several Parliaments, without any restrictions, or limitations, the engagements given underhand and Seale, re-iterated by feveral Letters, the Answer given to the Propositions of the Deputies general, and his Majesties answers to the Committee of the Parliament of Thoulouze, concerning the Chamber of Castres, the Garrison in Montpellier was continued, and a Cittadel also was erected there, the Fort Lewis was re fortified, and the Chamber was removed to Bezers: But this was not all; The Temples, or Churches of those of the Religion were still detained from them; The Parliament of Thoulouse made an Ordinance for dividing the Consulate of Pamiers, between those of the Reformed, and those of the Romish Religion; vexes and torments particular persons, by imprisoning their persons, and sequestring their estates for things they had, according to the tenor of the Declaration, been indempnished for: In short, the pressures of those of the Religion, since the Peace, were far heavier, than those they suffered in the time of the war. The Duke of Roban continues his follicitations at Court; and declared his mind so freely, that he was forbid any starther to mention of their affairs, it being the King's pleasure that they should addresse themselves to the Deputies general, who also promised with all speed possible to send Commissioners into the Provinces to put the Edict in execution, and redresse all their grievances.

In the mean while the Galleys remained still at Bourdeaux, and the Duke of Guise came up with his Ships to the Isle of Re, which gave a great alarm to Rochelle, and made the Duke of Soubize, and the Count de Laval, to retire also to the Town: But this fear was quickly over; the Duke withdrawing thence, and sayling with his Ships towards Marseilles, followed by the Galleys, whose absence had much prejudiced the trade of Provence, imboldning the Pyrates so, that they took and carried away their Merchandizes even in sight of Marseilles. But the King discovering much displeasure against those that sled in to Rochelle, the Count de Laval, went to make his Apology at Court: But the Duke of Soubice, conceiving that way not honorable for him; and that his abode in Poictou, or Britany, could not be with any security, goes directly to Castres.

But let us now look after the Commissioners sent into Languedoc to put the Edict in execution; Favier, Counsellor of State, and Saint Privat, were sent on this imployment; but, to make short, did nothing, either in the upper, or the lower Languedoc, tending to the case of those of the Religion; but removing to Pamiers, sell into a division concerning the businesse of the Confulate there, and each of them sent his opinion, and reasons to the Court: And thus passed the year one thousand six hundred and twenty three.

In the beginning of the year 1624. La Vicuville, whom the Chancellour had advanced to the Super-intendance of the Finances, not enduring that his Benefactor should be his Competitour in favour, amongst other things complains of the differvices he and Puisseux had done the State, in preferring the interest and advantage of Rome, and Spaine, before that of France; and that the acceptance of the Articles of Peace touching the affair of the Valteline; by the Commander de Sillery Embassadour at Rome; and brother to the Chancellour, was occasioned by instructions, which he (unknown to the King) had received from France, to that purpose: Whereupon the King, as easie to believe the worst, as hard to believe the best of any one; resolves to deprive them of their Offices, and gives the Seals to Alligre Counfellour of State, and Puiseux his Office of Secretary of State, was shared among his other companions; and Viewville remainted the only Favourite; who to improve their disgrace to his further advantage, caused all the Embassadours to be changed, placing creatures of his own in their rooms; and had like to have framed a Criminal Process against the Chancellour; who in a little while after dyed of grief and age; and the Keeper of the Seals was promoted to his place.

After this, the new Favourite, changing the former Maximes, that he might the better discover the male-administrations, of those whose disgrace he had procured, caused the Treaty of the Valteline to be disowned; obtaines another more advantageous to the State; sets on foot the Marriage of Madame the King's Sister, with the King of England; renews the Leagues for the recovery of the Valteline, and rescuing it from the oppression of the Germanes: To which end Bethune was sent Embassadour extraordinary to Rome; the Marquess de Cœuvres to the Valteline; Mansseld into Germany with considerable Forces; and the Constable with the Duke of Savoy against the Genoeses. This disposition of affairs gave fair hopes of great matters, which indeed had very prosperous beginnings.

And that there might be a good stock of money to carry on the Warres, an Inquisition into the Financiers was thought very expedient. And because Beaumarchais Vieuville's Father-in-law was the chiefest, and wealthiest among them; they resolved to disgrace him first: And in order to it, first of all they scattered little Pasquils against him; afterwards they dealt more boldly, and plainly with him; and every one, prognosticating, from the violent prosecution of his Father-in-law, that himself was not like to continue long; took liberty to exhibit accusations against him also, so that at length the King commanded him to be arrested, and sent to Amboise, where he was kept till he made an escape, without ever knowing the cause of his imprisonment, and is now at his own house in full liberty, and security.

To this Favourite succeeded the Cardinal Richelieu, who owed his first introduction to State employments to his predecessour Viewville. See how faithfully these Favourites serve one another: The King recalls Schomberg, and sets at liberty the Marshal d'Ornano, who by the instigation of Vieuville had been a little before committed to the Bastille. The support the Cardinal had from the Queen-Mother, made his favour more lasting than the others, and encouraged him also to greater insolencies: For the King having a great aversion to the Queen, his Wise, and no less a jealoushe of his brother, the Duke of Aajou, conceived that the Queen his Mother, would be of great use on him, to moderate, and compose these domestick jars, which more disturb the Palaces of great Princes than all their other affairs besides.

The Cardinal who now grasped the whole power of France, continues the Treaty begun with Forraign Estates, and consummates what his Predecessours had left impersect. But Arnaud, Governour of Fort-Lewis, dying, and Toiras succeeding him in his commands, favoured by the Cardinal, and Schomberg, conceives greater hopes of ruining Rochelle, than ever Arnaud did; which were so earnestly embraced, as if they had not at the same time undertaken a War against the King of Spaine; So that the Rochellers, fadly reflecting upon the encrease of their persecutions, and that the preparations to block them up by Sea were near perfected, and that the Forraign Engagements, nothing lessened the contrivances against their Town, apply themselves to the Dukes of Rohan and Soubize for their advice, and affistance; who were perplexed with many doubts about it, by reason of the divisions, and other defections they had experimented in the former Wars, and that they were fearful of displeasing the English and Hollanders, because of the League lately made by them with the King, conceiving that from them they were to expect either their preservation, or their ruine: Nevertheless the neceffities of the Rochellers forced them upon a defign, which the Duke of Soubize undertook the management of on Blavet, and the ships that were there preparing for the Siege of Rochelle, hoping that upon his success in the Attempt, the Allies, and Confederates of France, would more easily incline the King to an Accommodation with the Rochellers, as well for the difficulties would obstruct the pursuit of his intentions against them > by reason of the losse of the Ships destined to that purpose, as also for his desires to continue the grand design of the League.

Upon this ground the Duke of Soubize about the latter end of the yeare departs from Castres to go into Poieton, where very fecretly he makes ready five small Vessels; with which, notwithstanding the persidiousness of Nountiles, to whom he had intrusted the knowledge of the whole design, and who a little before it was ready for execution had discovered it; he resolved either to carry the Fort, or perish in the attempt. In the beginning of the year 1625, he sets saile from the Isle of Re, with three hundred Souldiers, and an hundred Mariners, which gave the great Ship called the Virgin so brave a charge, that after some resistance, he himself boorded her the third man, with his sword in his hand, took her, and, presently after, all the rest.

After this he lands his Men, with a refolution to attempt the Fort, which upon Nouailles information, was newly reinforced with fifteen or fixteen piece of Canon, and aftronger

Garison.

The Duke of Vendesme who was Governour of the Province, and had made great preparations to block up the Duke of Soubize in the Port of Blavet, presently rallies up two thousand Foot, and two hundred Gentlemen, to force him in the Port, and with an Iron Chaine, and a Cable, as big as a mans thigh, stops the mouth of it, which was very narrow and close adjoyning to the Fort; So that Soubize for three whole weeks was locked up in it, having nothing to guard his ships, and man the Town of Blavet (whose advenue, which was very straight, he had cut off) withal, but the above-said number of three hundred Souldiers; and was reduced to such an extremity, that the day before he got off, his great Ship called the Virgin, endured a battery of six pieces of Canon, and received an hundred and fifty shot.

Whiles he lay in this perillous condition, the wind, that had been, till then, still against him, changed, and Soubize seizing the opportunity, sent some Shalloupes mann'd with good resolute Souldiers, who, though all the while exposed to the sury of two thousand Musquet shot, with Hatchets cut assunder the chain, and the Cable, that barred the Port; By this means he got out with sisteen or fixteen ships, and lost but only two which were run aground on the Sands: In this Equipage he recovered the Isle of Ré, where having mended his ships, and gotten together about sisteen hundred men, he seizes on the Neighbouring Isle of Oleron, where he staid to compleat his Army.

The Duke of Rohan, at the same time, had also made way for some attempts in Guienne, Languedoc, and Dauphine: But the Secretary Monibrun, as he was travelling with some overtures from the Duke to his sciends, was taken at Villenseufve neare Avignon, and discovered all, which dashed the greatest part of his designs, and caused the three sons of Montbrun to retire to Andure.

Book III. The Memoires of the Duke f Rohan.

Presently was the news spread abroad, that Sorbize his project was discovered, and broken; and the long time he was shut up in the Port of Blavet, greatly perplexed the Dake of Roban, who had no other news of him, than what the common rumour brought, but saw him discovered by the Town of Kochelle, by the Deputies general also, and by sall the persons of quality, that were of the Religion, at Paris, who more favouring the Court saction, endeavour'd to make all our Towns disclaim him.

During this interval nothing was attempted: The two Eldest of Monthrun's sonnes, discouraged at these unhappy beginnings, make their peace, renounced the Duke of Rohan, and go into Dauphine, but the youngest named Saint André, the most resolute of them, came to Castres, and did what he could, though in vain, to encourage, and retain his Brothers in the arty.

The Chamber at Begiers, and the Presidial of Niscres also, together with all Officers of our Towns, make goodly Acts of difavowal, which they fent to the Court: But at length when the news came of Soubize's gallant and fortunate Sally out of the Port of Blaver, and that he was absolute Master of the Sea, they began to think other wife of him, than as of a Pyrate; and the Baron Pujols was fent from Paris to the Duke of Roban, the Co-Ionel Revillas from the Duke of Savoy, and after them came the Baron of Coupet also from the Constable, to mediate an accommodation, to which the Duke was really enclined, and clearly did what lay in him to promote it, out of a defire he had to ferve the King in his Wars in Italy: But either the perperual and malicious contrivances at Court, against those of the Religion, or the bad Instruments employed in the Treaty, or the indisposition, at that time, of the late King of England, and late Prince of Orange, to affift us, or all these things together, frustrated the negotiation of the success it might have otherwise had, and prevailed so with our Towns to make them disclaime the Duke of Soubize, that the Duke of Roban, who till then would not ftir, was now enforced to take up arms, to fhew, that it was no defect of power, (as they imagined) but his zeal to pacifie and compose things, that had hitherto restrained him.

The first day of May he began with an attempt upon Lavaur, but coming an hour too late, he missed of his aimes there: yet was not this expedition wholly successeles, for in it he wrought all the Towns of Lauraguan to declare for him; and at his return to Castres, he found, that according to his order, the Marques of Malange was turned out of Realmont, which about a month before he had possessed himself of: And here it is to be observed.

Ha tha

that Malauze was sought after, as far as Auvergne, to be made Head of a party against the Duke of Rohan, for that the Town of Rochelle was divided, and the Common Council refused to joyn with Soubige: So that the Deputy of the Town, in all negotiations, spoke only as from the common people, which party, the Magistrates, and Principal Inhabitants, still opposed: So that a very hard task had the Dake of Roban, to reconcile, and unite the Town of Rochelle, and the other Corporations of the Religions with Soubige. And forafmuch as it was very requisite he should go to bring about the Sevenes, and the lower Languedoc, where the Deputy of Rochell could not have audience; he convoqued an Assembly of the higher Languedoc at Castres, by which being chosen for their General, he raised some Troops, established a Committee of the Assembly to order all affairs in his absence, and then sent Saint Andre de Montbrun with a Commission to be Governour of Montauban, which after much reluctancy, at length declared also for the party.

This done, he goes thence with fix hundred Foot, fifty Horse, and sour score Harquebusiers, and marchestowards Miltard: When he came to Saint Afrique, he was met by Courrelles, sent from the Town of Rochelle, and Soubize, to inform him of the entire conjunction of the whole Town with Soubize, and that, according to the Articles of Agreement, they had sent Deputies to the Court, desiring us to do the like, and to this end La Faye Saint Orse had brought the King's pass-ports for the principal Corporations; to which his Majesty was at length induced, after he had in vain essayed to divide the Dukes of Rohan and Soubize, and bring them to feveral Treaties.

When the report of this news was also brought to the Council, and that Convictles had represented to them the great divisions of the Rochellers, and the factions sprung up amongst them, how extreamly desirous they were of peace, upon what hard conditions they had joyned with Soubize, and the ill order they took for their Navy, they conceived they had now no time to throw away upon tedious debates; and that (though Roban liked not of their procedure in Treating with the Court) fince Rochelle had begun, it was expedient, to shew that the party was well united, and ready to follow their example. Le Clerc , and Nouillan, were chosen Deputies for Montauban, Dorson, and Madiane for Caffres, Guerin for Millaud, and Forrain, and Milletiere, for Rohan, who desirous to extract what advantage he could out of this opportunity, to infinuate into the Sevenes, makes use of the King's passe-ports to induce them to call an AF sembly as Anduze; which happily succeeded: From Milland hc he draws his Forces to Saint John de Brewill, which made a flourish, as if they intended to stand it out: but when they saw him in a posture ready to storme their Fort, they instantly changed their note, and submitted. Hither came to him three Deputies from Vigan, to dissivade him from marching thither, for that he would finde the Gates shut against him; to whom he gave no other answer, but that he would try whether he should or not: The next day he continues his way, and two Leagues from Vigan, met another messenger to the same purpose, who also added, in case he advanced, threatnings of essusion of blood: But this prevailing nothing on him, his adversaries courage sailed them, and they drewback; So that without any difficulty he got to Vigan; whose gates thus opened, cleared all the way as farre as Andurge.

Whiles he was on his march, the Prefidial of Nismes, and also the Chamber of Beziers, used all their skill (but to no end) to alienate the affections of the people of the Seveness from the Duke; who having resolved on a journey to Nismes, was yet loth to put it to a hazard, without first sounding the inclinations of the Inhabitants, for fear lest so publick an affront, as a resusal to his face, should ruine his whole affairs. To this end he sent thither Saint Blancart, who having conference with some of his friends in the Suburbs, their advice was, that the Duke should suspend his coming thither, and that they would fend their Deputies also to the Court, that the Town of Usez should do the like, with instructions conformable to those of the Sevenes; which accordingly they performed, choosing Castanet for Nismes, and Viguier, Goudin, and Boisleau, for Usez.

The Duke of Roban feeing, that he was excluded out of the Towns of Nifmes, Ufez, and Alez, convoques an Assembly of the Sevenes, at Andaze, the most numerous he could, where yet there were many wanting, from many of the Churches, especially of the Colloque of Saint Germaine, where the Marquess des Portes mainly opposed him; and after he was declared General of that Country, he sent Caillou, Du Cros, Phyredon, and Pagesy, Deputies to the Court.

While these things were in agitation, the Marshal Themines brought four thousand Foot, six hundred Horse, and Canontoo, and with them a great terrour also upon the Countries of Lauraguais, and Albigeois; whereof the Duke being advertised by redoubled messages, he sends back the Marques of Lusgaan, with all the Forces he had brought with him, and with all diligence hastens his levies of Souldiers, to be commanded by Freton,

Saint Blancart, and Valefoure, in which his endeavours mer with such unhappy traverses, that instead of four thousand men, which was the number he aimed at, he could muster but half the number: Whiles these men were raising, he sent his Scouts towards Sommieres, refolving to attempt it with seven or eight hundred common Souldiers, upon this supposition, that Valance would not run the hazard of drawing out of his Garison, to relieve it, that it would be a means to make Nifmes publickly declare for him; and that if he could have but twice four and twenev houres time, the whole Countrey would come in to him, and raise him to a condition able to force the Castle: But, as it is a danugeres thing to prefume on the defects of others, instead of zelying on a mins own strength, the event clearly deluded his preconceptions; For though he had taken the Town, Nilmes would not flire to his affiftance, nor could he get relief from the Sevenes time enough; Valence at the same time fent twelve hundred men, out of his Garison, to relieve the Castle, who from three of the Clock in the afternoon, till night, fought with Saint Blancart, who had lodged himself, with three hundred men only, in a place of such advantage, that he could be no way forced, not yet could be hinder the entry of the relief into the Cafile, by reason of the extream largness of the advenue: Which the Duke perceiving called off Sain Blancart into the Town; refolving, that night, to draw off with the whole party also, which he did, carrying with him his wounded men; and among others Freton, who was wounded with a Musquet shot in the knee, of which he afterwards dyed: Saint Blancait in this conflict, when the relief enter'd the Castle, lost three Captaines, and some other Officers.

After this, the Dake thought on nothing more, than hastning his Levies, that he might be in a condition to relieve the higher Languedoc; and taking order that his affairs in the Sevener might not be prejudiced in his absence; to prevent which, he left a Committee of the Assembly, to direct the management of them; in which he engaged all that had any interest in the places of greatest consequence, and left Chavagnac his Field Marshal to command all the Souldiery in that Country.

While these things were in agitation in the Sevenes, and the lower Languedoe, the Marshal Ibemines drew near to Castres so plunder, and spoyle the Countrey, which put the Council the Duke had less there, in such a consusion and seare, that they direct not give order for any thing at all, but less the whole burdthen upon the Dutchess of Roban, who contrary to the natural and more tender disposition of her Sex, shewed so much care and resolution in all things, that, every one deriving courage from her example, the Marshal received several losses, being worfted in every skirmish before the Town; where Nougarede an old Gentleman of the Country got much honour.

In the mean while the Marquels of Lusignan marches towards Castres, with those Forces the Duke had given him to conduct thither; which when the Marshal had intelligence of, he drew off his Cavalry, and part of his Infantry, to fight him; whom he found lodged in Croisette, a Village two Leagues distant from Caftres, where he stormed him, but found him so well Barricado'd, and resolute upon his defence, that after a furious assault, he was faine to retire with much loss, many of his men being flain and wounded; which when he had done, the Marquess of Lusignan retreated as farre as Brassac, and the next day, taking another way, marched with all his Troops into Castres, at noon day, Drums beating, and Colours flying, and without any opposition This renfort, with some skirmishes that passed to the Marshal's disadvantage, made him, seeing he could do no further mischief to the Town, resolve to retire to Saint Paul, and la Miatte, which were sufficiently manned: Nevertheless Saint Paul made no refistance at all, but was taken in the open day without any battery raised, or siege formed, and the Souldiers all marched off to La Miatte, which they yielded also upon composition not to bear arms for fix months.

This was the only check the Marshal Themines, by chance, gave us in Lauraguais, and Albigeois, where, when he had fired the aforesaid places, he made as if he would besiege Realmont. But understanding that the Duke of Roban was come hitter with above two thousand men, which he brought from the Sevenes, whose passage at Larsac, where he had designed to sight him, since he could not prevent; he draws offall his horse and soot, marches up almost to Castres, firing all as he went, passes by Brassac, endeavouring to gain a commodious field for his Cavalry, between Cauve and Viane: But Roban, having intelligence of it, makes such haste, that by incessant marches might and day, he got to Viane, before the other could be on his way thither; from whence he sent the Regiment of Valescure to Cauve, and his own guards, and the Captain Dupuy with his Carabines (for that his foot was so tired they could not march) to Brassac.

The Marshal having now lost all hopes of preventing the Duke, and taking B assac, goes forward, burning some Villages in his march, and comes with his whole strength, both of Horse, and Foot, in sight of Viane, where having drawn them up in Battaihia, and feeing that the Suburbs of Viane, called Peiresegade, which lies at the bottome of the Town, and is divided from it, by the height of the hill, was not at all fortified, falls into it with all his Forces, takes, and fires it, and then retires to his Quarters: In this assault there was one Captain slain, another taken, and about five and twenty, or thirty Souldiers killed and wounded, Saint Blancart also had a light hurt; and the souldiers that were in the Suburbs drew up to the Town.

The Dutchess of Roban, who by several messengers had sent to informe the Dake, of the Marshal's design to stop his passage, omits nothing on her part, but fends to all the Garifons, appointing them a Rendezvouz at Braffac; which the Duke having notice of, he departs that evening, and comes to Brassac; where finding fifteen hundred Foot, and two hundred Horse; he refolves, the next night to fend out to discover the posture of the Marshal's Army, which lay at Esperance between Brossac and Viane, and according to the intelligence he should receive to fall into his Quarters the night following, with all his Troops, Saint Blancart by the way of Viane, and he himself by the way of Brassac. The discovery made, and the Scouts returning with intelligence that the Army lay there in great disorder, and in a place of great disadvantage to the Horse, the design to beat it up was concluded on; but the very day preceding the night it was to be put in execution, either upon notice given him, or that he forefaw their intentions, or that provisions failed him, he quitted those Quarters, and taking his way towards Vabres, went to lodge at La Bichenie: The Duke also rallyes all his Forces, and marchestowards Croffette, and Reque-courbe, from whence he fent five or fix hundred men into Realmont, and then divides all his, Troops about Caftres, to observe the posture of the enemy, who when they had refreshed themselves for some dayes about Lautree, march towards Lavaure, and there prepare for a march into Foix: The Duke goes into Lauraguais, puts some men into Britefle, fends the Regiment of Fiction to Revel and Sourire, and that of Montluz and Valescue, to Realmont, and as soon as he saw that the enemy steered his course towards Foix, he commanded Saint Biancart, who was then at Puylaurens, thither with five hundred chosen men.

Lusignan, in the mean time, being informed that the Regiment of Lescure had taken up their Quarters in the Suburbs of Teillet, goes instantly to beat them up; breaks through their Barricado's, kills, and wounds about an hundred, takes one Captaine, and forces the rest to slie for shelter to the Fort; but had become by night, as he did by day, not one of them had escaped; for there was a very great diffention between Grandval, who commanded the Fort, and Lescure, to whom he would never have opened his Gates in the night time; which was the reason that induced Lusignan to this attempt, in which Valescure, and Montluz, two Colonels were wounded, but not much: After this the Duke of Roban returns to Castres, whither he commands Lusignan also; rallies what Forces he had, takes with him one piece of Canon, and Marches towards Realmont, both to give the enemy a diversion, and to enrich his Army with

Boory. The first place he fell upon was Sicurac, which endured five and twenty, or thirty Canon shot, but after he had fired the Town through the breach, they were faine to yield. This march of his made the whole Countrey look about them; The Duke of Ventadour got together about two hundred Horse, and two thoufand Foot; The Marshal Themines also hies thither, with all his Horse, and the Regiment of Normandy; but both the one, and the other, being informed that the place was taken, went back again; and the Duke continues his course towards the Mountain of Albigcois and Rouergue, leaving his great Canon at Realmont, and taking with him only two little field pieces, that carried a Ball about the bigness of an Orange.

Those of Foix in the interim, sent him word, that the Inhabitants of Caumont, Lesbordes, Samarac, and Camerade, were refolved to fire their own Towns, and retire, the former to Mageres, the other to Azil, for that they wanted Souldiers to defend them; whereupon the Duke commanded thither Boissiere Lieutenant Colonel of Freton's Regiment, with five hundred men, many of whom, when they heard they were to go to Foix, forfook their colours, fo that he went with two hundred, and forty only, who got very well thither.

And here we may not pass over in silence a generous action of seven Souldiers of Foix, who resolved, in a poor mudd walled house called Chambonnet near Carlat, to wait for the Marshal Themines, and his whole Army, whom they there kept at a Bay two whole dayes; and after they had, in several assaults, killed forty of his men, feeing their ammunition was spent, and that he was drawing down his Canon upon them; they confulted how they might, the night following fave themselves; to which end one of them goes out to discover how they might avoid the Courts of Guard; which when he had done, and as he was returning, the Centinel of the House espying him, and taking him for one of the Enemy, shot at him, and broke one of his Thighs; Neyertheless he gave them an account of his discovery, shews them the

the way, and very instantly urged them to make their escape: But his brother, who was also the man had wounded him, almost mad with grief, resolves not to leave him, and tells him, that since he had been the unhappy instrument of his disaster, he would be his companion in what fortune soever befell him: The good nature of one of their Couzin Germains, moved him also to a resolution of embracing their destiny; so the other four at the request of these, and under savour of the night, after mutual embraces, save themselves; whiles these three, placing themselves at the door, charge their Musquets, with patience expect the light, and then most valiantly receive their enemics, of whom when they had slain a good number, themselves dyed freemen. The names of these poor Souldiers deserve a place in History, their action being not inseriour to the most naemorable, Antiquity can boast of.

But to return to the Duke of Roban, who marches along the frontires of Rowergue, and takes a small Fort called Roque Ciziere, in which he left a Garrison; the same day he goes to another, called La Bastide, which he found deserted, as also some others which were pillaged, and burnt: From thence he goes to la Cauve, and in his way thence towards Augle, takes and burns some other small Forts; and then makes a descent into the Valley of Mazavel, where he goes on firing more Forts, up as far as Saint Pors: And as he would have continued this progresse, in revenge of those places the Marshal of Themines had fired in his absence; he received intelligence from Bretigny, Governour of Foix, and from Saint Blancart also; that the Marshal Themines, and the Count de Carmain, Governour of the Province, had invested Azil, with an Army of feven thousand foot, six hundred horse, and nine peece of Canon; that there were in it feven hundred fouldiers, people of the same Countrey, which they had fent thither, under the command of Captain Carbonst, and Caprain Vallette, both experienced old fouldiers; that they could not conjecture, what would be the issue of the Siege, for that the place was but weak, and the affaults most furious; but yet was it ofthat confequence, that if it should miscarry with those which were in it, there would not be men enough left to maintain the lower Foix, both by reason of the weaknesse of Pamiers, which would require a very strong Garrison, and also of the Intelligences the enemy had in it: But if he could spare them a recruit but of five hundred Men, they would engage themselves to keep the lower Foix, and would do their uttermost to preserve Azil.

Book III. The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. 107

This Intelligence diverted the Dukes resolutions, who thereupon sent Lusignaz with a party of Horse and Foot, to convoy the Canon back to Castres, and thence to Realmont, while he himfelf with the residue of his Troops, with much difficulty convoys six hundred Souldiers to Revel, where when they had staid a day to receive some pay, he sent them under the command of Valeseure into Foix, who conducted them very well thither; and then returns to Castres.

The difference between the Baron de Leran, and Eretigny, much perplexed the Duke of Roban, for that, being Master of Carlat (which was but a League distant from Azil) it was in his power either to promote, or impede its relief: Whereupon he sent Villemore and Orose, Captains of his guards, to make him sensible of the injury he did himself, in obstructing the relief of Azil, by denying his Souldiers admittance into Carlat, commanding them withal, in case the Baron would not submit to reason, publickly to declare to the people of Carlat the cause of their coming; which they so handsomely ordered, that he was compelled by the Inhabitants to yield to the Duke's commands, and to receive whatever Souldiers should at any time be sent thither, by his order, which proved no small advantage to Azil, and indeed was the only cause of its preservation.

While things were thus carried on in Foix, the Duke d' E-spernon, with fifteen hundred Horse, and sour thousand Foot, advances towards Montanhan to ravage the Countrey thereabouts; and Soubige, to divert him, makes a descent into Medoc, where he took some Garisons: But understanding that Manti, with the Admiral of Zealand, named Haultin, were coming against him with forty good Ships of War, he re-imbarques, meets, fights, and deseats them, sinks five of their Ships, of which the Vice-Admiral of Zealand was one, and kills them more than sitteen hundred.

The news of this defeat, made them change their note at Court, and whereas before they protracted the Freaty in expectation of the issue of this fight, now, seeing it proved to their disadvantage, they conclude it, and send Deputies to the Rochellers, to receive their acceptance of it: Forain also goes to them from the Duke of Roban, who, considering the indisposition of the King of England, and the Prince of Orange, towards their party, advised them to accept of that peace their Naval Victory had purchased them; to which Soubize adds his perswasionsalso; but the Rochellers very indiscreet in that particular, and according to the humour of people as insolent in prosperity, as dejected in adversity, results to hearken to it, without a present demolition of the Fort.

108 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book III.

In the mean time the King takes great care speedily to repair his Fleet, and obtains of the King of England seven great Ships; So that the delayes the Rochellers used in concluding the Treaty of peace, gave their enemies opportunity to corrupt some of the Captains of Soubize his Fleet, and among others, his Vice-Admiral Fozan: At the same time also the Duke of Montmorency resolves upon a descent into the Isle of Re, and to make an attempt upon Soubize his Fleet which lay in the Foss del' Oye, a Road Joyning to the Town of Saint Martin de Ré, a rash and senseless enterprize in appearance, which yet treachery made seisible, and purchased it a sar different Character.

Then came Milletiere and Madiane to Rochelle, with the Articles of peace agreed on at Fortainbleau; but it was then, when Soubize, who was in the Isle of Re, sent them word thence, that the King's Navy were fayling towards him, and that with all speed they should transport themselves into the Island: At first, every one laughed at this Message, nay, and there were some in Rochelle offered to lay great wagers, that the English and Dutch S'tips were called off again: Soubize reiterates his Messages, and for the last time summons them to his assistance: There were then in Rochelle eight hundred Gentlemen weil mounred, and about eight or nine hundred Souldiers, of Soubize his Army, with the greatest part of his Officers, and among others the Counts of Laval, and Loudriere: Upon this last summons they all make ready to imbarque; but the Major diverted them, perswading them that they were better to expect the morning, than run the hazard of the evening Tide, and so made them lose all opportunity to transport themselves; For the next morning appeared thirteen of the King's great Ships in the Road, which prevented their passage over: Soubize seeing himself thus abandoned, lands all his Foot, which were not above fifteen hundred Souldiers, leaving only an hundred in his great ship called the Virgin; commands his Admiral Guiton, and his Vice-Admiral Fozan, not to thirre out of the Road, where they were secure, but there to wait his further Orders; And then divides his Army into three Squadrons, to secure those three places, which he conceived most obnoxious to danger, and where he thought it most probable that the enemies should attempt to land: But, notwithstanding all his care, he could not dispatch time enough, before Toiras had landed three thousand Foot, and fifteen hundred Horse; whereupon he resolved to draw all his men into a body, and fight him the next day, which accordingly he did: At the first onset he routed the Avantguard, and slew about three or fourescore of the most forward of them; but being relieved by the main body, Bellesbat who commanded Soubize his left wing, instead of seconding him, faced about, and plunged himself, and the whole party he commanded in the Marshes: This much encouraged the Enemy, who now oppressed Soubize on all sides whose Major General Verger-Malague, and some of his Captains being flain, the rest fled in such consusion, that all the Art and Industry of Soubize could not rally them againe; who yet that day, even by the confession of his enemies, justly purchased the reputation of a worthy Commander, and valiant Souldier. remainder of his Troops he drew off to Saint Martin de Rewhere he made account to transport them agains to his ships, and once more try his Fortune in a battaile at Sea; But there he found, so great a terrour had possessed Guiton, that contrary to his express command, he had turned out the hundred Souldiers left in the Virgin; and that Fozan, with some Captains, combined in the same conspiracy with him, to intimidate the rest, had runne aground the best ships, and that the rest, seeing themselves thus betrayed, and abandoned, shifted every one, the best he could, for himself; all but the Virgin, in which there were only five Men left, but very resolute, who seeing four of the King's ships making towards them, resolved to stand it out against all extremities: The enemy came up to, grappled with, and boorded them, whereupon the Master, whose name was Durand, leaps into the powder with a lighted match, and blows up all the five Ships together, in which there perished seven hundred thirty fix men.

In this accident there was one thing very remarkable, concerning one Chaligar a Gentleman of Poictou, and his fon, who were two of the five left in the Ship: The father, before the firing of the Magazine, being wounded, and disabled to save himfelf by swimming, commanded his son to shift for himself, who, with much reluctancy, at length obeyed him; but the good man, being in the protection of God, was as well preserved, as his Sonne; for being, by the force of the Powder, carried up into the aire, he chanced to fall into a Shalleup of the enemies, without receiving any surther harm at all, and was afterwards ran-

Soubize finding his affairs in so broken a condition, leaves his Major General Le Parc d' Archiat, at Saint Martin d' Re', and in a Shalloup gets to the Isle of Olerez, where he provides the best he could for the preservation of it, leaving five hundred men in the Fort, which he furnished with all necessaries, and then, with seven of his ships, which had retired thither, seen out to sea, and out of the reliques of his late Fleet, gets together two and twenty Ships, with which he passes into England to repair them: After which, Le Parc à Archiat, made an honourable composition, which was also well observed, and drew off all his men from the Isle of Re to Rochelle; But those that Soubize lest in the Isle of Oleron yielded themselves basely, a thing not unusual after such routs; for it is not given to all men, to have their courages of an equal temper in adversity and prosperity.

This fatal accident did not so much deject the spirits of the Rochellers, as it elevated theirs at Court: For when Milletiere and Madiane, returned thither with the Rochellers acceptance of the peace, they would not endure any further mention of it; but to break them by a division, continued their old project of granting a peace to the higher and lower Languedoc, excluding Rochelle, and Soubize.

While these things thus passed in those parts, they of Azil held out beyond the expectation of their friends, and the hopes of their enemies that befreged them, who from a battery of Nine Guns fent them in three thousand shot, and made three indifferent large breaches: But the enemy preparing to give them a general, and furious fforme, Bretigny, and Saint Blancart, who had several times relieved them, resolved, now at this last push, to Rack all their powers for them; The conduct of this relief was undertaken by Saint Blancart, who got in to them with three hundred and fifty men, forcing, in his passage, a Court of guard which kept a Bridge, with the loss of one man only: The arrival of this renfort filenced all disputes, among the besieged, concerning the command, which before had occasioned some divifions among them; but all acknowledging Saint Blancait for their Superiour, he fo well ordered all things, that after the expence of eighteen hundred Canon Bullets within the space ofthree daves, the Mar shall themines gave them a fierce affault with his whole Army, commanding also five hundred Reformado's to dismount, and ferve on Foot (there being many hundreds of people that had placed themselves on the tops of Mountains to behold this fight:) Thrice was he repulled with the loss of above five hundred men; Within the Town the Captain Vallette who commanded at one of the breaches was there flaine, some other Officers too, the befreged loft, together with seventy or eighty Souldiers flaine and wounded: But above all, either friends or enemies, Saint Elancart there Renowned himself, both by his prudent care and vigilance in repairing the breaches, and his Valour in defending them, being alwayes ready in person at all places of greatoft danger; in this action surpassing even himself: The Marflial

shal now thinks of nothing, but how to draw off his Canon; in which having spent two whole nights, and many of his Souldiers, which he lost in the Attempt; he drew off with the Fragments of his shattered Army towards Lauraguais.

This small success, together with the effect the Duke of Ro-han's continual sollicitations wrought upon the people of Nismes, inducing them to declare for his party, relevated his affairs out of the drooping condition they were in: Some of our Deputies then attending the Court, were about the same time sent to the Communalties to procure their acceptance of the peace, excluding Rocbelle and Soubize, which many ill affected zealously promoted, especially at Castres, where they had resolved to affent to it upon those terms: But Roban arriving there in the nick, and urging their former resolutions to the contrary, made them alter their intentions, and then summoned an Assembly at Milland, where the Towns of Nismes and Usez appeared by their Deputies, and all unanimously made an Act of acceptance joyntly with Soubize and Rochelle, and fent it to the Court,

The Duke who feveral times had experience of their endeavoursto surprize him, under pretence of Treating, stops not there, but goes to Nismes, and Usez, where he was received with great acclamations of joy; and having confirmed his Party in Aleiz, by fending thither Marmeyrac, a Gentleman of the Country, to head them upon occasion, departs one night from Nismes, and comes the next morning, by ten of the Clock, to Aletz, where at first he found the gates thut against him, but the industry and diligence of Marmiyrac quickly got them open, so that now there was not any place in the lower Languedoc, or the Sevenes, that had not declared for the Duke of Roban, who convened an Affembly of the Sevenes at Aletz, both to affure himself of the Town, and also of the Collogue of Saint Germain, which the continual follicitations of the Marquess de Portes, and his faction, had still kept off from him; which obliged the Duke, in the interim, before the meeting of the Assembly, to make a step thither, where his presence was of great use, both to procure Deputations for the Affembly, and the conjunction of that Collogue with the others.

At the beginning of the Affembly the Dutchess of Rohan difpatched Villette to the Duke her Husband, with intelligence, that, upon the affurance many Communalties had given of their readiness to accept of the offered peace, with the exclusion of Sonbize and Rochelle, the Court party slifted persisted in their former resolutions, not to admit of any other, and had sent back

lome

112 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book III. Some of their Deputies to declare their adherence to them; and that therefore it would concern him, to have a vigilant eye upon their actions: This message had a sinister sence put upon it, and the Marquess of Montbrun, who a few dayes before came to Nismes, on purpose to infinuate himself into the affections of the people, found no better expedient to effect it, than vailing his intentions with a pretence of much zeal to the Religion, by forging scandalous accusations against the Duke of Roban; which when he had notice of, and that Du Cros was come with the final determination of the Court, not to grant any peace, but with the exclusion of Soubize, and Rochelle; he took him with him to Nismes, convoqued a second Assembly at Millaud, and caused Nismes, and Usez, in his presence, to nominate their Deputies, and resolve in no wise to desert Soubize and Rochelle; from thence he went to Vigan, where he also caused Deputies, of the like resolution with those of Nismes and Usez, to be chosen for all the Sevenes; and with them all proceed together to

While he was thus busied about these affairs, he receives news of Soubize from the Dutchess of Roban, which assured him, that, within three months, the King of England would fend a very considerable relief to Rochelle, desired him to make it known to the party, and to order things fo, that they defert him not. When he came to Millaud, he understood that the higher Languedoc had determined to accept of the peace, excluding Soubize and Rochelle, and that, had not the presence of Lusignan, and Saint Blancart, as they returned from Foix with the Troops of the Sevenes, very opportunely prevented it, they had fent their acceptance to the Court. This intelligence made the Duke carry on the Assembly as far as Castres, where when he had assembled the Province anew, and received the resolutions of those of Montauban, to the same effect with those of the Provinces of the lower Languedoc, and the Sevenes, he inforced the former to retract their late intentions, and to confirm the other Act of acceptance, including Soubize and Rochelle: But to effect this, he was obliged to some extremities, securing the persons of seven or eight of the most eminent Citizens, whom he dispersed into divers places of Rohergue, and the Mountain of Albigeois; publithing a Declaration of what he had done, as also the reasons moving him thereunto, together with the Decrees of the faid Provinces, which were approved by all, except the Town of Puyaurens, who resolved to stand upon their Guards, and not to open their gates to any of either fide; protesting notwithstanding that they would not dif-unite from the party of the Religion, When

When their affairs were brought to this pass, the Deputies were sent back to the Court with the final determination of the Provinces not to abandon Rochelle: And a few dayes after their departure, arrives a Messenger from Vivaretz, who informed the Duke, that Brison had taken Pousin, and some other places of less importance, and that all Vivaretz had declared for his party, and did beseech him to advow the taking of those places, and to confer the Government of Pousin, and the whole Province upon

Erifan, which he condescended to. Not long after, the Dutchess of Roban sends the Viscount Roussille to her husband, with intelligence that the Earle of Holland, and Sir -- Carleton extraordinary Amba Tadors from England, and Arfens extraordinary Ambalfadour from the States of Holland, were arrived at Court to follicite the King to fign the League, and make us accept the peace, which she believed was already well advanced, and that the defired, if possible, to hear from him before it were concluded; to which the Duke replied by the same Messenger, that above all things the Deputies should endeavour to preserve from demolition, the fortifications of Pousin; that that being obtained, and the Rochellers contented, the Communalties where he was, would rest very well satisfied: But befides the aforefaid Ambassadours, those of Venice and Savoy, in short, all that were interessed in the League, out of the hopes the King would fign it, interposed their mediation also, to hasten the peace; which the Ambassadours of England by a Deed in writing, in the name of the King their Master, became sureties for the entire observation of; against which the Deputies of the Communalties having nothing to object, the peace was accepted by them, on the fifth day of February, eight dayes before the re-

Whil's the Duke was busied in composing the disorders of the higher Languedae, he was alarmed by reiterated messages, that Nismes, unless his sudden presence prevented it, would be certainly lost, by reason of the divisions happened since the arrival of the Marquess of Montbrun, and his brothers there; who with many Artifices, and great diligence, had gained the populacy to them, and by seditions, and tumults, attempted to ingross the power of the whole Country, which the most eminent of the Nobility withfood, so that the matter was now come to a formal quarrel, which, but by his presence, was not appeasable; this made him hasten his instructions for the higher Languedae, where he leaves the Marquess of Lusgran, with sour companies of strangers, whom he quartered in Castres, and then posts away to Nismes; where at his arrival, he mat first of all with the Baron D' Arbais, whom, the lower Languedoc had deputed to the Court; and afterwards with Montmartin, the Deputy General, who brought with them their late acceptation of the peace, and were now come to have it ratified; Mainald the other Deputy General, Du Candal, and Mailleray were sent to Rochelle, Novillan to Montauban, and Madiane to the higher Lauguedoc. Montmartin follicites the Duke of Roban to ratifie it at Nism s, but by no means would he consent to any particular ratification; but summoned an Assembly to be held at Ni mes, in which the Act of acceptance should with a general confent be confirmed on the fifteenth day of March following; deferring it to a longer term, that he might in the mean time hearfrom Rochelle; in which interval, Monimartin goes to the higher Languedoc, to hasten the Deputies of that Province to appear at the time appointed: But he found that at Montauban the peace was already accepted, and that, without expecting the Convocation, all the higher Languedoc had also ratified it, fending their Deputies thither for forme only. The day before the Seffion of the Affembly, the Duke was informed of the Rochellers confirmation of it also; so that there remaining only the lower Languedoc, and the Sevenes to do the like, the Affembly drew up a general Act of Ratification, which Montmartin and Aubiis with the Deputies of the Duke of Roban carried to the Court; in this act only the Province of Vivarety was not comprized, for that then they must surrender Pousin, which our Deputies could not preserve, because they had no Commission to make any demands concerning it before the peace was concluded; which was occasioned by the negligence of the Deputy of that Province, that gave not notice of the taking of Poulin, till many dayes after the departure of our Deputies towards the Court.

Thus was our, peace concluded, where we must observe, that the King, our of sear of the supplies the Duke of Soubize had procured in England, taking occasion from, and making very good use of the discontents of the English Ambassadours, sent Bottes into England, who so well managed all, that during his Embassy, which lasted but three weeks, he obtained a Rentoy of new Ambassadours thence to France, to conclude all things concerning the League, upon condition they should enforce the Deputies of the Religion to accept a peace, upon very ambiguous and uncertain terms, especially for the Town of Rochelle; who, in regard they had no hopes of any considerable relief from any other particular Provinces, to show that they of the Religion prefer d the advancement of the grand design of the League before their own security, and to remove out of the way the pretence of the Kings Counsel for not figning it, while the War continued in France, did the like: But so resolute was the demeanour of the Dutchess of Roban towards the English Ambassadours, and the Cardinal Richelieu, to whom he protested, that unless the Ambasfadours interposed in its nothing should be concluded, that, after the had neatly broken a particular Treaty of the Rochellers, carried on by their Deputies, whom the Court-party, and the Duke of Trimouille had drawn over to them, the prevailed to far upon them all, that contrary to their former refolutions, they interessed thenisclves in it. This shelter'd her from the malice of her enemies, and the Deputies from any blame that might be imputed to them from their Communalties, and also obliged the King of England, feeing that the peace was accepted by his advice, to fee it faithfully observed, to which his Ambassadours more strictly bound themfelves by a formal Deed, figured, and fealed with their own Arms; fo that the conclusion of our peace was an universal joy both to the Court, and all Forraign Ambassadours there residing; but fifteen dayes after, when contrary to the solemn protestations made to them concerning that particular, they faw also this Treaty in the Valtoline was concluded by the King, & the King of Spain, they were clouded with no less discontent; especially the English, when they perceived, that betrayed by delufory hopes, they had been made the instruments, to oblige us to accept a peace so much to our disadvantage.

Thus did the French, in consening the English, and all the Princes interested in the League, deceive themselves also, having done nothing in this affair, that tended not to the advantage of Spain, the oppression of the Allies of the Crown, and the great detriment of France it self.

This is an account of the passage in the second War; in the progress of which Roban and Soubize were opposed by all the Grandees, even of the same Religion, whom either too much envy, or too little zeal, had alsened from their party, by all the Officers of the Crown, and a great part of the most eminent of every Town, whom their own covetousness, and the allurements of the Courts had blinded; as for the Forraign Nations, the English and Hollanders contributed their Ships, and Germany it self stood in better peace could not be obtained; but yet was it much more advantageous than the former, for simuch as those of the Religion preserv'd their Fortifications, and got the King of Englands caution for the performance of it; God will affish us more powerfully, when our entire conversion to him makes us more capable of his favour.

DUKE of ROHAN:

The fourth Book.

Containing a Relation of the third Warre against those of the Reformed Religion in France.

Frer the peace was thus accepted by those of the Religion, Brison only, who had not taken up Armes till towards the end of the War, seeing that a submission to the Treaty of peace would divest him of Pousin, aplace upon the Rhone, which, not long before, he had surprized, resused to be comprised in it; encouraged thereun of the Constable Lessigneers, who was the constable Lessigneers.

an ample Pardon, and forty thousand Crowns, in lieu of that place, which was yielded up by him, and afterwards, by the King's command demolished.

This was the last Act of the Constable's life, which suddenly after the termination of this affaire, crowned with many dayes and much honour, he yielded up at Valence: He was a Gentleman of Dauphine; who by his valour, prudence, and good fortune, having passed through all the lesser charges of the War, had advanced himself to the highest: And had not so constant and uninterrupted a course of prosperity, essaed, towards his latter end, all shame in him, so that, he dishonoured God, by his domestick, and infamous debauches, sullying his house with Adulteries, and publique Incests, he might have justly been parallel'd with the greatest Persons, Antiquity can boast of!

From this amicable composure of our Intestine differences, fprung faire hopes of the duration of our peace; which in a short time also withered: For it was contrary to the intention of those that aimed to raife their fortunes upon the ruines of these of the Religion: Amongst whom the Marquess de Portes was the most violent, who favoured by the command he had in the lower Linguedoc, left no way unessayed to force the people upon some desperate course; of whom he exacted contributions as in the time of the War, though by the Articles of the Treaty, they were entirely abolished: But this being not enough to provoke a people harraffed with fo many and yet smarring mischiefs, and covetous to enjoy the small repose they possessed, they fly to another invention; which was to ground a jealousie upon the Duke of Rohan's stay at Nismes, which many, out of a defire, either to conserve an old ill paid pension, or to purchase a new one, fomented with frequent calumnies, no week passing without some new accusations exhibited against him, upon which, and the facility they proposed to themselves of expelling Town, they resolve to make him the object of their malice, furthering their design by an occasion taken from the annual elections of the Consuls for Nismes, who are alwayes chosen at the later end of the year.

Whiles they so industriously labour his ruine here, they are nothing less remiss to procure it in the other Provinces, and indeed over all France, striking at him by the National Synod, appointed to be held at Casires as a place most animated against the Duke, for that during the last War, he had used some severity towards some persons of quality in that Town, that would have retrayed him. Thister was sent Commissioner Galand, a perfon without contradiction of very great abilities, but withal mercenary, and void of shame, or conscience, with instructions to disapprove the Duke of Roban's late engagement in armes, to disadvow his forraign Intelligences, and, if possible, to get him excommunicated.

The Duke seeing two such strong batteries raised against him. and threatning more danger than the War it felf, prepaies to defend himself against their violence : And forasmuch as that of the Synod seemed to be of greatest consequence, he endeavoured to secure himself against it, by procuring, in several Provinces of France, the election of such persons for Deputies, as were men of an inflexible integrity both to the Party and himself too, and draws up a Declaration, remonstrating chiefly the just cause he had to use such proceedings against those he had formerly expelled the Town; for that he knew that to be the principal crime they had to charge him with in the Synod: And for a fmuch as the Town at a publick confultation, had ordered their gares to be kept shut against him, and that he seared the like usage from them to any should come from him, he very privately made choice of another M'nister, in the room of his own Chaplaine, to communicate his Declaration to his friends, and to entreat Beaufort the Deputy of the Sevenes to deliver his Letter, which he had written to the Synod, with charge, that neither the one, nor the other should discover themselves, but when it might be very seasonable; which happened well to him; for they were prepared to refuse admittance to any that should come from him; nay, Marmet his Chaplain, though he protested, that he came only about an affair of particular concernment to himself, could not be permitted any longer stay there, than of four and twenty houres.

On the fifteenth of September, in the year 1626, Chauve was chosen Moderator, Bouterone Affistant, Blondel Pastor, and Petit an Advocate of Nismes Scribe. And now Galand bestirres himself against the Duke of Roban, whose enemies in Castres are no less diligent in preparing the venome they had to poure out against the Duke in the Synod, animated also thereunto by the Commissioner Galland: But all their designes vanished into air: For the Deputies being before sufficiently satisfied with the reasons moving the Duke to proceed against them in that manner, made them not dare to present any bill against him to the Synod; who nevertheless could not conceale the displeasure they had conceived against those of Castres, with whom they disclaimed any suture reconciliation; so that they were now become a general abomination; and the only way to ruine any affaire, was te, offer it to Galand's recommendation; And thus ended the Syned, where, by the Kings command, (that he might abridge those of the Religion, of their liberty of convening any Generall Assemblies) were chosen the Deputies General: The fix nominated, were the Count de la Suze, the Marquess of Galerande, and Beausort for the Nobility: and for the Commenalty, Texier, Dupuy Deputy of Burgogai, and Bazin; of whom Galerande and

Bazin were accepted. This affair thus terminated, we must now reslect upon the Confulate of Nifmes. The Presidial, or Soveraign Court of the Town, according to the humour of many Corporations, not brooking the Duke of Rohan so near them, joyned with a Party composed of many persons of Note in the Town, whom the Court faction had invited, and drawn over to them: But finding themselves yet too weak, by ordinary and Legal wayes, to promote to the Consulate Creatures of their own, they resolve to engage the Royal power in it, and to effect it by wayes unufual and destructive to their own Priviledges, and contrary to the Articles of the late Peace. To which end, they fend privately to the Court, where they obtain a Commission directed to the Chamber of Edist in Languedoc, to go and order the said Election of the Confuls; and that nothing might be omitted to forward their defign, the Duke of Montmo ency is fent from the Court into his government, who passes by Nismes, where he encourages those of his Faction, which he strengthens with the neighbouring Nobility; and those he could not win to his Party, he forces to absent themselves from the Towns till the business was determined: And for as much as the Marquess of Montbruntowards the latter end of the former war, had gained some credit among the Papulacy, he was also sent for cut of Dauphine; for they hoped not only to make such Consuls as should be at their devotion, but upon the Dukes opposing himself against it, to hale him out of the Town, dead or alive: These things thus prepared, the day of Election comes; the Marguels of Montbruk also arrives at the time appointed, so do Monsac, DeSuc, and the two Deans (or Seniour Counsellors) of the Chamber, who were nominated Commissioners for this affair; who declaring their charge to the Deputies of the Town, receive for answer, their fixed resolutions, to maintain the Priviledges of the Town: The Common-Council of which meet according to their accustomed manner, in the morning to proceed to the faid Blection; whither the Commissioners goalso; but finding the doors of the Townhouse shut, are fain to return to their lodgings, where they declare against the proceedings of the Common-Council, and send about about the Town to affemble the Inhabitants for a new Election; fome refuse to stir, others go, but without any commotion in the Town were obliged to retire again.

Now the new Consuls enter not into their Office, till a moneth after the Election; so that the Court had leasure to send a Prohibition to those that were elected, forbidding them to meddle with the Office, and enjoying the old ones to continue the exercise of it, till it were otherwise ordered: notwithstanding which, when the first day of the year was come, the Baron d'Aubais, Genoyer, Saguer, and Pel siere, according to the usual manner took possession of the Consulate; where we shall leave them in repose, to look further back upon the affairs, and view their propenfity to new imbroylments.

When the Peace was concluded in the year 1626, it was conceived, that the Cardinal Richelieu's thoughts would be wholly bent onforraign affairs, of which he gave some semblant evidence: The Prince of Piedmont, then at Court, was nominated Leiutenant-General of the Kings Armies for forraign Parts; then hoped the Venetian Ambassadours, they should now see Italy freed from the Spanish oppression; the English that they would recover the Palatinate; and preparations were making (but in words only) for all these daligns; of the reality of which if any one seemed to doubt, it was confirmed by a thousand oaths: But when a few dayes after the figning of the Peace with those of the Religion, unknown to all the Confederates, was figned also that of France with Spain; then brake forth complaints and discontents of the one fide, seconded by excuses of the other, every one casting the blame upon another, especially upon Fargis Ambaffadour in Spain, whose Wife, as if he had exceeded the limits of his Commission, was made to sue out his Pardon: but these pretences could not falve the diftempers of the Confederates interefled in the League, which some of them afterwards upon occasions did discover.

The cause of this sudden and unexpected peace, was attributed to a diffre the Cardinal had to live some time in quiet, that he might the better secure his own greatness, and that nothing might obstruct his pursuit of the design against Rochelle, where he intended to dogreat matters; or else to some Jealousse he had conceived of a new party, to be raised in France, under the command of the Duke Anjou to ruin him; but whether it was the one, or the others or both together, certainly the occasion of these ensuing factions, gave him fair colours for any design.

tween him and the Princess of Montpensier, which he was absolutely averse from; whether this aversion proceeded from himself, or the suggestions of others, not desirous this treaty should take effect; which encouraged many to joyn with him. But the Prince of conde, and his Wife, whom this marriage threatmed with a remove fo many degrees from the Crown, as the Duke of Anjou should have Sons; The Count of Soffors for the same reason, and out of hopes he had to marry that Princess himself: The Duke of Longueville out of Jealousie of the Duke of Guise, whose Sons were all Brothers to the Princess Montpension; The Duke of Vendosme upon the same consideration, to which his Brother the Grand Prior of France added his discontents against the Cardinal, who had deluded him with promifes of the Admiralty of France, which afterwards under another title, he referved to himself; many of the chief Nobility out of particular Interests; The Queen who seared the others fertility would prejudice her in the King her Husbands and his Subjects affections; and the King himself induced by several apprehensions, opposed it : See here very considerable obstacles to be removed.

Nevertheless the Oueen-Mother, who with good reason grounded on her own, &the Interest of the State, was very zealous for this marriage, despairs not, but begins her design with an attempt to gain the Colonel d' Ornano, who was formerly the Duke of Anjou's Governour, and continuing still his Favourite had a great influence on him: To this end, she gets him made Marshal of France; but what ever promises these honours extracted from him, they quickly vanished, as soon as he saw the Princess of conde, whose beauty and attractions raised in him so much love and vanity, as totally blinded him; fo that being carefled and fued to of all hands, he lost himself in that Maze of felicity: the better to carry on his own defigns with her, he pretends to the Queen-Mother that his services are wholly bent to effect her desires, and procure her contentment, when really the charms of that Princess had drawn him entirely to her devotion; 'Twas she also governed' the Queen, proposing to her the disrespect and contempt the Children of the Duke of An ou would bring upon her; and that if he must needs be married, her Sister the Infanta of Spain would be a more convenient match for him: But all this while this Princess hoped that having clearly gained the Marshall d' Ornano to her affistance, she should in the depth of this Labyrinth find out a way to conduct her own Daughter to the Dukes bed. See here three Parties in one, the Queens, and those of the two Princes of the blood, all which, though for different reasons, and which they concealed the one from the other, conspire to impede this match; and so strenuously prosecute their desires, that the Duke of Anjou absolutely refused her.

At the same time there hapned a private quarrel which was feconded by many other: Chalais Master of the Wardrobe, having in a Duel flain Portgibault, younger Brother to Ludde, Nephew to the Marshall Schomberg, and a Favourite of the Duke d' Elbeuf, caused a great division in the Court; the Duke of Anjon, the Count of Soiffons, and the Grand Prior, undertook the protection of Chalais; the Duke d' Elbeuf, with the whole family of Guise (except the Duke de Chevreuse) favoured the House of Ludde; this division lasted all the Winter; at length, Chalais having obtained his Pardon, and sensible of his obligations to his Protectors, gave himself up wholly to their Interests, and was of great use to continue the Duke of Anjou in his obstinacy against the marriage with the Princess Montpensier; The Princess of Conde also diffident of the sufficiency of her power with the Queen, perswades her to engage the Dutchess of Chevreuse in her party, for that her own Interests lying with the other Party, she feared lest otherwise she should divert her: But her will was eafily brought to a compliance with the Queens; the sense of her great obligations to her, making her promife to facrifice all her Interests to her commands and service. On the other side, the Queen-Mother passionately prosecutes the accomplishment of the Marriage; especially the Cardinal hoping that to effect it against so many and great oppositions, would enlarge the Princess of Monepensiers obligations to him so, that his power would suffer no diminution, though misfortune should alien even the Kings affections from him; the Princess of Conti, Sister to the Duke of Guise, and all their family bestir themselves mainly to the same end, and by the means of the Duke d' Elbeuf, who was a Friend of Baradas the Kings Favourite, or elfe of some other persons who engaged themselves in it, the King was also brought about to rellish the match too, out of an apprehension insused to him, that those three factions pretended only a rupture of the marriage, whereas, in effect, their defign had no other aim but his ruin, to clap him into a Monastery, and marry the Duke of Anjou to the Oteen: This impression made him now as zealously promote, as he had formerly opposed the marriage; earnestly importuning his Brother, and fending to the Marshall d' Ornano, who returned large protestations of obedience to his commands, but that as yet he could not discover any disposition in the Duke for it: Thus for some time was the Marshall caressed and sued to by all parties.

In the mean while, the opposite Party strengthen themselves with a supply of all such as hated the Cardinal, especially the Duke of Savoy, who, (desirous to repay him the ill office he had lately received by the conclusion of the peace with Spain, which exposed him to the inconvenience of a war with Genoa, and the hatred of Spain,) by his Amballador the Abbot of Scaglia, proposes to the Duke a match with the Princess of Mantua, and by the same instrument instigates him to rid himself of the Cardinal, as the only obstacle to all his designs; but the Prince of Condé, and the Princess his Wife, seeing the King varied in his, had not courage enough to persevere in their resolutions for the Party they had undertaken, though they were most engaged to prevent the marriage; but indeed so great a propensity was there in their natures to treachery and falshood, that without any difficulty was this change wrought in them: the one hoping to gain a piece of Land, called Dun-le-roy, and was a part of the Crown-land, to joyn it to his Dutchy of Chasteau-Roux; and the other, that she might not totally leave the Court the seat of her pleasures and contents; and the better to act their parts, the Prince comes to Valery, not far from Fountainebleau where the King then was, whither the Princess also makes several journies; after which the Marquels of Brezé Brother-in-law to the Cardinal, makes three voyages thither also, but very privately; to whom, as "tis faid he gave an account of all passages, adding to, rather then curtailing the relation of any particular, according to the custom of all Informers, that by fuch means hope to inhance the price of their discoveries.

About this time were intercepted several packets going into Spain and Savny, which occasioned the securing of the Marshald Onano, who was yet somewhat more ceremoniously dealt withall then ordinary, in regard of his Master: The King one afternoon commands the Regiment of his guards into the Basse Court at Fountainebleau, under pretence of exercising before the Queens; but instead of returning to their quarters, they possesse the substitute of all the advenues of the villags, which was also surrounded by the Cavalry: And the King going very early to bed, not long after rose again, sent for the Queen-Mother, the Cardinal, the Chancellour, and the Marshall Schomberg, with whom he resolved upon the Arrest, which was executed by the Cautain of the

Whereupon the King sent instantly for the Duke of Aniou, to let him know that the reason of his imprisonment was, because he knew that instead of serving him according to his duty, the Marsh til insulad bad Counsels into him: at which the Duke was highly displeased, and to as little purpose discovered he his different and to as little purpose discovered he his different and to as little purpose discovered he his different and to as little purpose discovered he his different and to as little purpose discovered he his different and to as little purpose discovered he his different and to as little purpose discovered he his different and the little purpose discovered he his discovered his discovered he his discovered his gust both in words and gestures, flies in great fury at the Cardinal, demanding of him, if he had been privy to this design, who told him that indeed he was not ignorant of it; the same demand makes he to the Chancellour, who for not daring to advow the action, lost his seals a few dayes after, and was banished the

After this Arrest of the Marshal, was Chaudebonne, a Domestick of the Duke of Anjou's fent to the Bastille, as also Modene and Deagent for their old faults: The Count of Chasteau-Roux, and the Chevalier de fars were also banished the Court, suspected for having so great a dependance on the Queen and the Count of Soissons. The Marshal was fent to the Bois de Vincennes, and all the places under his Command feized on, the most considerable of which was Pont Saint Esprit in Languedoc: The report of this, made all the Princes and Great ones then at Paris, and in no little amazement at this accident, return to their attendance on the Court.

The Duke of Anjou perfifts still in his discontent, and is more averse then ever from the marriage with the Princess of Montpension; But being yet destitute of any safe retreat, he is inforced to cover his displicature with a diffembled accommodation with the Cardinal; and hunting often about Fountainebleau, resolves one day to go towards Fleury, and dine with him, who then lay there; but having notice of the Dukes intentions, and that it was only to do him a discourtesse, departs thence before day, comes to Fountainebleau just as the Duke was rising, and gave him his thirt.

This little discovery rouses the Cardinal, and makes him very follicitous to provide against the storms impending over him: he understands moreover, that all contrivances against his life come from Savoy, that the Abbot of Scaglia is the chief Instrument imployed in it; that the Queen made use of the Dutchess of Chevreuse to animate the Duke of Anjou against him, that the Grand Prior irritated by a private discontent, is also one of the most violent against him, whereupon he resolves to ruine those he could, and to rid himself of the rest the best he could.

This was the ground of his irreconcilable hatred against Savoy, of the ruin of the Grand Prior, Chalais, & the Dutch. of Chevreuse. To compass his design, and prepare his way to the Government of Britany, which he coveted for its good Forts, and the conveniencies to execute this new office of Superintendent of the Sea, which he had introduced to succeed the suppressed Admiralty of France; he suggests to the King, that the Duke of Vendosme grew too potent in Britany, confidering his pretentions to that Dutchy

Dutchy in the right of his Wife, and the alliance he was entring into with the Duke of Retz, who was very powerful in that Province, and Master of two of the most considerable places in it: that the Grand Prior, the most zealous of all the Duke of Anjou's Partisans, washis brother; that it might be one day a most secure retreat for the Duke, and of dangerous consequence to all France, confidering its fituation both so near to England and Spain; and that it would be expedient to provide timely preventions against such fatal accidents. This made the King resolve upon a journey thither, and to prepare himself for it, the whole Court removed back to Paris; but the better to conceal the intended voyage, they pretended only a journey to Blois; Nevertheless the Grand Prior rightly conceiving that a further progress was designed, offers to seek out his Brother, and bring him to justifie himself against all accusations whatever; provided he might be secured by an engagement of their words, not to be injured in his person: this he imparts to the Cardinal, who approves of his design, fils him with hopes, but no promise of security, advising him to procure that of the King, which he does, and so departs for Britany.

The Duke of Anjou was very unwilling to this Journey, but finding no evasion for it, at length resolves upon it: All the Court go, except the Count of Soissous, and the Princess of Montpensier, whom the sickness of their Mothers stayed behind. The King being at Blois, thither came the Duke of Vendosme and his Brother: For two dayes together the King made them infinite caresses, which the third night he closes with an Arress by the Captain of his guards, and then sent them both Prisoners to the Castle of Amboise.

After this was done, the Cardinal, who had all this while flayed at one of his houses near Paris, comes to Blois, openly commisserating the missortune of the Grand Prior, but not his Brother, in which the whole Court sympathize, for that the one was beloved, but the other hated; and that which most moved their compassion, was, that the Grand Prior had most innocently been the Instrument of both his own and Brother's disaster. The resolution for the voyage into Britany is continued, and also to press the Duke of Anjou to the marriage, who still opposed it? But some of his Party, fearing lest at length he might recede from his resolution, advise him to quit the Court: Some counselling him to take the way of Rochelle, others that of Metz: Moreover they send to the Count of Soissons for Balagny and Boyer, two trusty persons, the one to be his conductor towards Rochelle, if they took that way, and the other to treat with his Uncle the Book IV. The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. 127 Duke of Villars Governor of Harre, that they might secure that Port to receive the forraign succours promised them. But as 'tis usual in all dangerous enterprizes, mens hearts failing them, inflead of executing their defigns, they raife difficulties to overthrow them, so happied it in this; For instead of going themfelves, they fent a Gentleman belonging to Chalais, to the Duke of Valette to know whether he would receive the discontents, and by that means gave him opportunity to evade a business, in which, had they surprized him, he had without refistance been engaged: For conceiving by this message that they were not well resolved, he fent them word, that the place belonging to his Father the Duke d' Espernon, he must first send to know his pleasure, before he could return them any other answer: This very well pleased those that diffwaded his departure, especially Chalais who was of a mild temper, and naturally averse from faction; to which his friends had never inclined him, had not his spirit been too flexible to withstand their solicitations; so that seeing the trouble and danger still increase, he grew very desirous to dis-entangle himself of the affair, and to that end, intreats the Commandeur de Valence to affure the Cardinal, that he would renounce the Duke of

Anjou's Interests, and become his servant; The Cardinal who defired nothing more, receives and cajoles him so handsomly, that he engages him by promise, to discover all the Dukes designs to him : This lasted a few dayes; but the inconstancy of his humour, which yet was nothing mischeivous, hurrying him to another change; he repents of his promise, will discover nothing, and raccomodes himself with the Duke of Anjou; requesting the Commandeur to revoke the promise he had given the Cardinal in his behalf, who excuses himself of the employment, foretelling him, that it was the next way to a Prison or worse; But Chalais notwithstanding, persisting in his resolutions, got some other to carry his intentions to the Cardinal, who nothing relified the message, which recalled to his mind the business of Fleury, and gave him some Jealousies that it was the Dutchess of Chevieuse that had regained him, and therefore he thought it now time to dispatch him: Wherefore he causes him to be arrested and sent Prisoner to the Castle of Nantes; and Commissioners of the Parliament of Britany were appointed for his trial; at which he confesses, and accuses, what, and whom they please; thinking by that means (being little versed in criminal proceedings) to fave himself, confirms also some flying reports of his engagement to kill the King who was helping him to bed; but he was condemned and executed for this only, that being a Domestick of the Duke of Aujou's, he had advised his Master to retire from the Court: But after all these weaknesses, seeing how inessectual they had been to fave his life, he dyed with much courage and constancy; At the same time also was Marcillac apprehended, and devested of his Government of Sommieres in Languedoc; Troncon and Sauveterre were also banished the Court, for prefuming to diffwade the King from the intended marriage: To which the Duke of Anjou, during those procedures, was anew urged; and his Favourites being already won, the Duke upon hopes of the Marshal d' Ornano's, and Chalais liberty, at length resolves upon it, and falling from one extremity to another, fuddenly and privately marries the Princels of Mon-pensier, (who was purposely fent for from Paris with a gallant train) loves and carefles her, and now cannot live without her. Hereupon his Appanage was af-Agned him, to wit, the Dutchyes of Orleans and Chartres (wherefore for the future we shall call him the Duke of Orleans) together with the Earldom of Blois; great in appearance, but seated in the heart of France, without any good place within the whole circuit of it, and of a very small revenue, his chiefest assignations for the maintenance of his house being out of the Treasury, that so they might at pleasure be taken from him.

The marriage thus confummated, they proceed notwithstanding to the execution of Chalais, inquiring also after informations against the Duke of Vendo sac sespecially whether he held not Intelligence with the Duke of Soubles, during the war in the year 1625. Commissioners also were appointed for the trial of the Duke, and his Brother the Grand Prior; but the one objecting the Priviledge of his Peerage, and the other of his Cross of Malta, they were at last sent to the Bois de Vincennes, without any further proceedings against them; only the Dukes houses in Britany were razed, and he was deprived of his Government of that Province, which was conferred on the Marshal Themiais. thought the reason that diverted the Cardinal from the design he had upon this Government, was, that having placed into Breft, one of the fairest and securest Ports of all France, one Sourdeac, a creature of his own, out of hopesto secure it to himself; the King without his privity, conferred that command upon a Souldier of mean quality, which vexed him so, that abandoning all future thoughts of the other, he resolved upon the purchase of Hauvre de Grace in Normandy.

Upon the Consession of Chalais, Messengers were also sent to Verger, a House of the Prince of Guymenes to confine the Deches of Chevreuse there, but she escaped that confinement by her departure before to Paris, where being informed of what had passed, the recovered, by grear journies to Lorgain.

The voyage of Britany having thus succeeded, the King returns to Paris, where the Count of Soiffons durst not expect his arrival, but grown wise by the missortune of others, travels into Italy, where the Court-hatred pursued and persecuted him; For Letters were sent to Bethune Embassadour extraordinary for the King at Rome, that he should take care the title of Highness was not given him; to which Bethune having no other passion then for his Massers service, answers, that he would never be guilty of such a crime, but that if the Count of Soiffons had offended the King, he ought to punish him in France, and not in that which would so much intreach upon the honour of the Crown; and that he would rather quit his employment, then do such a differvice both to his Master and Family.

When the Court came to Paris, not a word was spoken of the Dutchess of Chevruse her removal; Sardigny and Bonail were confined to their own houses, one being accused for advising the Count of Sossions to leave France, the other for his too great propensity to the Queens service. Attempts were made also to take the Chevaliar d. Fars, which having notice of, he prevented by his flight into England; About this time also the Marshal d'Ornano died of the Scone, whose death occasioned several discourses.

We will now leave the Duke of Ocleans to comfort himself with the embraces of his new Wife, for the losses and misfortunes of his fervants; and the Cardinal to refresh himself awhile, after having diffipated fo thick, and menacing a cloud, as hovered over his head, to come to the affairs of England; whither the Abbot Scaglia, four moneths before, was gone in quality of Ambassadour extraordinary, and carried together with his Masters, his own particular passions, both being unanimously bent to spare nothing, that might purchase them a sound revenge upon the Cardinal's There he found the Duke of Buckingham of the same humour, whom he encouraged to procure the banishment of all the French attending on the Queen of great Bittany, for that they cherished their Mistress in some froward humours, which many times occafioned differences between the King and her, alledging that Spain, France, and Savoy would be sufficient presidents to warrant the action; recounts the numerous factions and discontents he hadleft in France, the ill usage of those of the Religion, in whose Interests the King himself was engaged, as being surety for the obfervance of the last treaty of peace, and assures him of his Master the Duke r Savoyes complyance and fidelity upon all occasions; orswasions joyned with the urgent sollicitations of the Duke of Soubize, in the behalf of those of the Religion, moved the Duke of Buckingham to perswade the King his Master private-Ly K

ly to fend a Gentleman to the Duke of Rohan to inform him of his deep resentments that those of the Religion had by his means and intervention been deceived, that he now faw clearly, that instead of restoring Rochelle to its liberty, preparations were makeing to oppress it, and that he desired to know also what persecutions they suffered in Languedoc; that it was expedient they should address their complaints to him, that, being Caution for the late peace, he might have just occasion to demand reparation for the infractions of it, which if it was refused, he protested that he would employ the whole strength of all his dominions, and hazard also his own person to obtain an exact and punctual observation of the Edict for peace: But that fince it was fitting, for the better Tustification of his procedures, to begin with such formalities, he defires that he would fend him over a Gentleman, by whom he might be fully informed and directed how to proceed.

The Duke who faw no humane means to preferve Rochelle but by relief from England, received this Message with all respect and honour; and informed the Gentleman, that the Communalties of the Religion could not write to the King his Master neither in General, nor in particular without being detected, which would crush the affair in its birth, that he would undertake that office for them all, by fending a Gentleman with a Letter, to implore that affiftance of him, he was obliged to give them; who moreover should be fully instructed with the particular in observations of the peaces and what he thought was the most convenient course to be taken in reference to the war: With this answer the Gentleman returned, and a few dayes after, according to his promise, the Duke dispatcht St. Blancart with orders to go by the way of Rochelle, to fee in what condition was the Citadel of Saint Martin in the Isle of Re; which he exactly well performed, and after his arrival in England, obtained a conclusion of a war for our relief.

In the mean while the Duke of Buckingbam causes all the Queens French Servants (except a Chaplain) to be cashiered, which made fo great a noise in France, that the Marshall Bassompiere was senr Embassadour extraordinary into England to compose the affair, and returned thence with satisfaction correspondent to his instructions and intentions: But the two Favourites accord not at all; he of France causes the Marshal, being no creature of his to be disowned, and the other procures a dissolution of the treaty.

Nor long before, the taking of some Normande ships by the English, gave another occasion of difference; The Parliament of Rouen hereupon not receiving that speedy satisfaction they expected, laid an Embargo upon all English V essels in all their Ports,

and the English upon the reciprocal and fruitless complaints of both Parties, made Prize of all the French they met with.

The Duke of Buckingham, who in all these affairs acted nothing out of affection to religion, or regard to his Masters honour, but only to satisfie his passion for some soolish Amours of his in France, upon these two occasions grounds a request to be sent Embassiadour to France; Thus from the petty follies of the Court, springs the disturbance of whole Kingdoms, most of the mischeifs that insest them slowing from the particular Interests of Favourites, who trampling Justice under their seet, subvert all good policy, thange the good Maximes of the State, and make their Masters but properties to support their greatness, wealth and revenge.

The Duke of Roban jealous of this Embassie, sent one of his Gentlemen very privately to Paris, to observe the actions of Buckingham, and to encourage him in his fornier resolution: But the King would not admit of his Embassie, so that his design of Love being frustrated, he now followes the dictates of his rage, and fince he could not see the object of his passion, resolves to thew the King his power, preparing all things for the war, in which, by his present care and affiduity, he redeems his former negligence and remisness; and that he might omit nothing that might further his design, the Lord Montague is sent into Savoy, and thence to the Duke of Roban, where arriving very privately, he delivers his Credentials from the King, and from Buckingham, in whose names he assures him of the great preparations in England for our assistance, to wir, of thirty thousand men to be disposed into three several Fleets, the first designed for the Isle of Re's the second coming up the river of Bourdeaux to land in Guienne, and the third in Normandy, to give the King a found diversion there, whil'st he should be bussed in Guienne; that the Rivers of Loire, Seine, and the Garonne should with good Frigots be kept closely blocked; that the Duke of Savoy would make an invasion either upon Dauphine or Provence, and moreover promised the Duke of Rohan five hundred auxiliary horse, and the Duke of Chevreuse also the like number; that his desire was, that with those thousand horse, and the foot he should levy in Languedoc, he would march to Montauban, to rally those of the Religion in Guienne, and joyn with the English Army, that should make its discent by the River of Bourdeaux: To which he replyed, that immediately upon the entry of the English into France, and not . before, he would engage himself to take arms, and procure the lower Languedoc, the Sevenes, Ronergue, and a part of the higher Languedoc to declare, and upon his own score to raise four thousand foot, and two hundred horse to march to Montauban;

and moreover, if he had half the Cavalry promifed him, he would undertake to joyn the English Aimy in any part of Guienne whatfocver.

Mou'ague returned satisfied with this answer, and the Duke of Roban began his preparations, which yet he could not make wich that secresse, but that the Court had soon an inckling of them; so that his Mother and Sister had been made Prisoners, had they not sought their safety by flying to Rochelle, where they did eminently contribute to the defeating of the King's designs there; and as all contrivances against him, were clandestine and underhand, so, for his part did he cherish those of the Religion in their discontens; especially concerning the Consulates of Nismes and Alexa, whose accommodations he prevented, so that he preserved those Corporations in a firm resolution to date all extremities, rather then suffer the least diminution of their Priviledges, and all the rest in a condition to adhere to them; And on the other side, the Courtsaction having interessed the Royal authority in the concern of those Consulates, would not in the least degree recede from their purpofes.

When things were in this posture, about the twentieth of July comes the Duke of Buckingham into the Rode of Rochelle, with a brave Armado, in which were ten thousand men, with store of Canon, and ammunition for war, with all forts of Instruments for Pioneers: which when the Rochellers faw, instead of receiving him whom they had so impatiently expected, they shut their , gates and havens against him, to prevent the arrival of any one from him, to impart his Commission to them; for the Maior and those in authority were corrupted by the Court Party, and the poor people had neither strength, nor courage to admit him: So that Soubize was fain to go on shore in a Shalloup, and landing near to one of the Town-Gates with one of the King of Englands Secretaries, his Mother went straight to another, whither when the Duke was also come, she went forth and drew him in by the arm, at which the People much rejoyced, and in great troops followed him to his lodging: When he was thus gotten in, he affembled the Councel of the Town, to whom the Secretary declared the substance of his Message after this manner; That the Duke of Buchingham had fent him to let them know, that by the command of the King his Mafter, he was now come in fight of them with a Gallant Army, ready to land where occasion should require; that that which induced his King to this, was his certain knowledge that the Councel of France, (corrupted by the house of Austria) conspired the ruine of all Christendom; which manifestly appeared in the affairs of Germany, which they have entirely ruined, especially by that permission was given to Count Mansfields Army to pass through France, which, as he was ready to march, was refused him, and was the destruction of that, and consequently of the German' Army, in which twelve thousand English perished by famine; that fince the King his Master had by his Ambassadours mediated a composing of the late War against those of the Religion, and engaged himself for the faithful observation of the Articles of the Treaty, (and that too with the consent of the King of France) in which, those of the Religion had submitted to conditions too harsh for their present estate to bear; he had seen their Confederates of Italy deferted, and the Armies designed for their defence, employed to block up their Garrisons, and to reduce this Town to a Consumption by Famine, the continual cries of which place, and of the whole body of the Reformed party, having by the mediation of the Dukes of Roban and Soubige, reached his eares, and taking notice of the vast preparations at Sea, closely to begirt this Town, and that to that end, by an unrepresidented act of injustice, one hundred and twenty English ships, with all their Merchandize, Mariners, and Artillery, were feized on in time of peace; that for these, and many other reasons, compassionating their miseries, and heavy pressures, his promise also to see the Articles agreed on, performed, obliging him, he now offer'd them a powerful assistance both by Sea and Land, in case they will accept of it, and engage in the War with him, protesting not to prosecute any particular pretention or interest whatsoever, save only what was accorded to those of the Religion, for which he became Caution: That in case the Town refuse this offer, the Duke folemnly protests before God, and the world, that he holds his Master fully absolved of all obligations both of Conscience, and Honour; and that for his part, he shall dispose himself to execute the rest of the commands imposed on him by his Master, and that he defires their clear and speedy answer: This Harangue much moved the people, who faw no other re-sourse, nor hopes of deliverance then from the English Arms; yet so prevalent was the faction of those that endeavoured the destruction of that poor, and miserable Town, that with much difficulty were they induced to refolve on any thing; at length they fent their Deputies to the Duke of Buckingham, to give the King of England thanks for the care he took of them, and withall to let him know, that having heard, and well considered of his Message, representing his Majesties good intentions to all the Reformed in France, of whom " they were but a part; that being bound by their Oath of Union to act nothing but by a general and unanimous confent, they conceived their answer would be much firmer, and more acceptable to the King, if it were accompanied with that of the Duke of Rohan, and the rest of the Resormed party, towards whom they were now sending with all speed; beseeching the Duke of Buckingham savourably to interpret this Protraction of the demanded junction, and be a means that it may not be displeasing to the King of great Britain. In the mean time they would address their prayers, and a yowes to God for the prosperous progress of his Arms to a plenary execution of the good, and holy intentions of his Majesty.

This answer had like to have drawn great prejudice on them of all hands; from the Engish, to see their great irresolution, and that they should n. ed a spur, who could find no safety but in their courage, and audacity; from those of the Religion, inasmuch as they demanded their advice, not assistance: Thus in affairs of great consequence, Councels accompanied with too much circumspection, are attended on by no less dangers; for they discover so much fear, as raises the courages of enemies, and depresses the friends: The Duke of Soubiese sent the Duke of Enchingham a particular account of this deputation, and answer, by Saint Blancarte, and withall, an absolute assurance of the Town of Ro-ch. He.

It is no v to be observed, that when Soubize left the Fleer, to know the intentions of the Ruchellers, two things were agreed on between him, and Buckingham: First, that the first descent should be in the Isle of Ol ron, both for the facility of it, there being not above twelve hundred fouldiers to oppose them, nor any fortress able to make eight dayes relistance; and also for the conveniencies of the place, abounding in corn, and wine, commodious for the maintenance of their Souldiers and Mariners, easie to be kept, and that once taken, and the English Vessels guarding the Sea, would in short time reduce the Isle of Re to great extremities; whereas if they made their first attempt on the other, which was well stored with souldiers, sufficiently fortified to make a good opposition, the success of the attempt would be full of hazard, and the conquest of uncertainty; the other was not to attempt any thing before the Duke of Soubize his return: But when Saint Blancart came there to acquaint the Duke of Buckingham with the iffue of his negotiation in Rochelle, he found the design varied, a discent into the Isle of Re determined, and ready to be executed, which th Duke of Buckingh m also, not expecting Soubize his return, hast-ns; whether it was, that he feared lest Toiras, who had already three thousand foot, and two hundred horse in the Island, should grow too stong, many of the Nobility, and great numbers of fouldiers flocking thither from all parts; or that he was loth

Soubize should participate of the honour of the action. At this discent there was a smart and gallant combate, the English, like a deluge, over-whelming all that opposed them, which greatly terrified the Romanist; and had he closely pursued the victory, and gone directly to the Fort, according to the advice of the Duke of Soubize, who was by that time gotten thither, he had sound it empty both of provisions and souldiers; but the loss of five dayes idly trissed away, gave Toiras leisure to rally his scattered men, and to carry all the provisions, could be found in the Village, up to the Fort.

This only fault drew after it many mischies on the reformed party; in this fight was slain Saint Blancart, (who came thicher foon enough to land the second man) deservedly lamented by his party, being a young man, whose piety, courage, and prudence emuloufly strove to renown him.

This discent of the English caused great commotions at the Court, and had a fudden taking of the Fort fucceeded it, probably a great alteration of affairs had followed: For the fickness, the King, about the same time, was surprised with, the general discontent of the Nobility at the Cardinals favour; the jealousie of those were but lately engaged with the Duke of Orleans; the abode of the Count of Soiffons in Piedmont, and the Duke of Savoy's known defires of revenge, for his defertion by the French, were sufficient grounds for more than ordinary jealousies; and every one impatiently expected to know the fate of the Fort, that they might declare their affections; which the King well knowing, omirted nothing for its relief; fed the Town of Rochelle with hopes of an accommodation, provided they joyned not with the English, essayed to work upon the Duke of Roban with offers of large sums of money, and dispersed Messengers to all the Reformed Towns, to render odious the discent of the English, and to draw from them fuch Declarations as might fecure him against the fear of their conjunction with them; and prevailed with Montauban and Castres to send Deputies to the other Corporations to dissiwade them from it, and by this Argument, that Rochelle had not joyned with them.

The Duke of Rohan, who for a long while before had been acquainted with the Artifices of the Court, and particularly knew their Partifans in every Town, fore-feeing well that he could now hinder fuch Declarations, advifes them to infert in them the general clause, under the benefit of the Edicts, and all other concessions, that so he might in convenient season disengage them again, and with hopes of good news from Rochelle, engages them not to desert that Town. At length come letters thence, but such, whose contents answered not his defires; nevertheless he is obliged to make use of them; but how to extract any advantage out of them, was no small difficulty: If he should send them to every Town, they might occasion divers resolutions to be taken up by them, and possibly contrary the one to the other, which must needs cause great divisions; if before he took up Arms, he should conveque an Affembly, none of the Corporations would dare fend their Deputies, for fear of rendring themselves criminal, which would yet be a greater evil; he resolves therefore to conceal the letters he had received, &at the same time to write severally to all the principal Communalties of the Sevenes, (and unknown the one to the other, nor mentioning any Assembly) to send their Deputies to him to Nismes, to whom he had things to impart that much concerned them in particular; the same desire fent he to Vsez; hoping that when he had drawn the Provinces of the lower Languedoc, and the Sevenes to any good resolution, the rest of the Reformed party, or at least the greatest part of them, would easily follow their example. This invention succeeded well; for all the Deputies came at the time and place prefixed; but the Commission of the Deputies of Vsez, being not large enough, and searing some treachery from that Town, he carried all the Deputies thither, and there formed an Affembly, not doubting, by his prefence, to confirm them to his party; this done, he recounts all the breaches of faith during the first War; all the infractions of the Edict of peace, made before Montpellier, (which occasioned the loss of that Town) the continuation of the siege of Rochelle; the detention of their goods, and the injust and cruel execution of many innocent persons, which was the cause of the second; which being composed by the intervention of the King of great Britain's Amb. fladours, they to obtain a condificention of those of the Religion to the Kings proposals, with the Kings consent, and in the name of the King their Master, became Caution for the performance of the Articles, which being no better observed than the former, the danger of Rochelle daily increasing by straitning their Port; the loss of their Franchises, and liberty of Commerce, by the repairing, instead of the promised razing of the Fort Lewis; by the fortifying the Islands, and storing them with Ammunition, and other provisions; by the building, collecting, and arming so many ships; by maintaining so many neighbouring Garrisons; by To many attempts upon the Town; by the subversion of the priviledges of Nilmes, and Aletz, depriving them of their liberty of electing Consuls; by the manifold infringement of the Edicts in all points, and laces, and towards all persons; that the confideration of all these this gs had obliged him to remonstrate their condition to the Kingsof great Britain, to implore him, according to his Royal promises, to afford us some redress of our grievances; which so prevailed upon him, that after a fluitless tryal of all fair means, he had at length refolved openly to affift us, and to that end had fent the Duke of Buckingham with a gallant Army, whose beginnings were very prosperous: But that it was upon condition, that the lower Languedoc should joyn with his forces, and not listen to any but a General Treaty, and with the consent of the said King, and of the whole body of the Reformed Party within this Kingdom; adding moreover that the Town of Rochelle would not conclude any thing without them: And, with that, shewed them the Letters he had thence, telling them, that, confidering the importance of the affair, he had thought it negessary to assemble the two Provinces of the Sevenes, and the lower Languedoc, that there might be a perfect harmony in their resolutions, which would never have been, 'had he sent those Letters to all the Towns severally; that, moreover, he could not in time of peace convoque an General Assembly, whose only summons would then have proved its prevention: but that he was affured that the resolutions of those two Provinces would charm all the rest to an imitation: wherefore he conjured them to a ferious confideration of the premifes, affuring them of his strict and perpetual adherence to them.

Whereupon they decreed that the Duke of Rohan should be defired to resume his charge of General of the Reformed Party, to make leavies of Souldiers and all other things he should conceive conducible to their good; that he be desired to form; as soon as may be a General Assembly, to continue during the war, for the direction and management of their affairs, that the oath of Union be renewed, with the addition of their Junction with the King of great Bistains forces, and also of all other Princes, Lords and Genelemen, that for the maintenance of this cause have, or for the sucre shall raise arms, with a subjunction of a promise not to accept of any particular peace, nor to consent or hearken to any treaty, but general, and with the approbation of the whole body of the Reformed Party, and of those Princes with whom they are, or shall be united.

This being done, they all depart: and Rohan gives out his Commissions, and, that he might not disgust the People, raises and arms his men at his own expence, appointing a day to make some attempts upon several places: And while he prepares himself for the field, let us reflect upon the Isle of Re', where we left the Duke of Buckingham, publishing a declaration to justifie his Masters proceedings, and advancing to quarter his army in the Town of Saint Martin de Re', whence he began to straighten the Citadel, consisting of four Bastions not yet perfected; and having no out-works to defend it: This place he resolved to reduce, by starving it, presuming they had but small store of provisions in it; and that being Master of the Sea, he might easily prevent the entry of any recruits either of men or victuals; but being something too careless in blocking them up, he contents himself with stopping up the Haven with boats and beams laid a cross it, surrounding the Fort with his Army, and the Island with his Fleet, but distaining to take a small Fort in the Island, which held for the King, and was seated on one of the best landing places in it; whence afterwards issued all the mischiefs that best him.

Besides those errors, were committed also these, viz. that in-Read of raising a work towards the Sea, the only quarter to be feared, a very frivolous and useless one was raised on the Land, and three Batteries, but at a distance, rather to affright, than hurt: A Well also was not well heeded, about five and twenty, or thirty paces from the Counterfearp, in which was only thrown a dead horse, and some stones to cover it; but the besieged knowing, of what dangerous consequence that loss would be to them. disfurnishing them of water in the Fort, quickly uncovered it, and having well cleared it, fortified it with a work, which preserved it them during the whole Siege: The Guards also were not well ordered towards the Sea; nor could the re-iterated advice of the Duke of Soubize ever induce them to divide their Ships, and place them before the Ports, where they would have much prejudiced the Romish Party. Nay, it was yet worse; for upon very light pretences, every day came one or other from the Fort, to speak with the Duke of Buckingham, and discover the condition of his Army; and from that time, by the means of the Baron De Saint Surin and Montaut, were set on foot on divers Treaties, which were continued till fuch time, as the Duke of Buckingham dispatch'd one of his Nephews to the Court with the faid Saint Surin, but for what reason, was not known to the Duke of Soubize.

Now for the better understanding of this Assair, it is to be known that Ré is an Islandslying about a League from Rochele, seven miles in length, and of great fertility, especially in wine, and salt: There are in it, three principal Bourgs, or unwalled Towns, of which Sant Martin De Ré is one of the sairest of France, and seated on the best Rode of all that Coast: There is also a fair Port, which stretcheth it self all along the Town, like a little Arm of the Sea; and it was the mouth of that which the Duke of Buckingham blocked up, to prevent the introduction of provisions into the Fort: Between Rê, and Brouage lies another Island, called Oleron, as big, and populous as the other, but much

Book IV. The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. 139 more fruitful; in which the King had 'garrison'd a Fort, buil there by the Duke of Soubize in the former War, but of small consideration; had Buckingham seized upon this Island, where almost all the Inhabitants are of the Religion, he had then totally defeated the Fort of Re' of all means of relief.

The King about this time falling fick, was conftrained to fend the Duke of Orleans in his place, to command, and confirm the Army, which the Duke of Angoules me had about Rochelle, where notwith standing the Rochellers protestations by which they disowned any confederacy with the English, yet was their usage nothing better, but they began now to begit them more closely by Land, to retrench all manner of Provisions: but the main design of the Army chiefly reflected upon the Fort of Ré, to recruit that with men, and victuals, in which they spared no expence, neither of men, nor money; so that at several times they got in sufficient numbers to keep it till its entire deliverance,

The Rochellers, after they had often, but in vain, renewed their protestations of fidelity and obedience, seeing that all their submissions, neither abated their sufferings, nor the malice of those who thirsted for their ruine, but only fomented divisions among those of the Religion, and furnished the ill-affected with specious pretences to exclaim against the others; at length remonstrate how that they had with-drawn themselves from the Crown of England, to subject themselves to that of France, the great priviledges they had acquir'd by it, their good services ever since, their immoveable fidelity, in which they had constantly persevered, notwithstanding the destruction of their Trade, the consuming of their Harvests, the devastation of their Countrey, the cruelties exercised upon their Citizens; in short, all those miseries which a licentious Army in many years can inflict upon their greatest enemies; and after this fad repetition of their sufferings, openly declare for the English.

As for the Duke of Rohan, he also publishes a Declaration, containing the infractions of the two former peaces, the reasons he had to resent them, and makes his Addresses to the King of great Britain, who was Caution for the latter; protests that he has no other aime, than at the observation of the Edicts, which once granted, he freely offers to expose himself to a voluntary exile from the Kingdom, that so there might be no ground lest for surure pretences and jealousses. On the other side, the King also issues forth new Declarations, in which he promises an observation of the Edicts to those that shall persist in their obedience, a pardon to those that had flown from it, if within a certain time they required to it, denouncing heavy securities against the persons, and estates of such as shall adhere to the Reformed Party; the Duke of Soubize was proclaimed Traytour; and the Parliament of Thoulouze, though it has no jurisdiction over the Peers of France, condemned the Duke of Roban to be torn in pieces with source horses, proclaimed him ignoble, and set a price of sity thousand Crowns upon his head, ennobling those that should assassinate him, which encouraged three or sour unhappy Villains to attempt it; but they came short of any other recompence than a Halter, or a Wheel; it being not within the compass of any humane power, without on especial permission of the Divine, either to prolong or shorten the life of any man. These light skirmishes of the pen thus dispatched, come we now to the more fatal ones of the Sword; of all the defigns contrived, and promised to the Duke of Rohan to be put in execution upon divers places, in several Provinces, none took effect, but that of Corconne, the management of which, he had committed to the Lieutenant of his Guards, together with one named De Pize, (who in a short time after, gave it back to the enemy again) The chiefest obstacle of it was, the peoples resulal to allow of any such attempts, before an open Declaration of the War: So that at the beginning of this, there was not any Paltry Village, or Fort, that stood not upon his Guard; a thing not heard of in the former Civil Wars, when men were more zealous for their Religion, more faithful, secret, and confident of their Commanders, to whom they gave so great respect, that their bare Tickets only were sufficient to engage them in a War, and to attempt the most considerable places of the Kingdom; whereas now the Irreligion and Difloyalty of those of the Religion, is more difficultly opposed, than the malice of their enemies.

About this time, Moriague fent him an Express, importing, that the intentions of a Discent to be made in Guyenne, were altered, and that for this Summer the Duke of Buckingham would make no invasion but about the Coast of Rochelle; so that the King of great Britain discharged him of his promise to march to Montauban, leaving him at liberty, to make choice of what place he pleased for this Summers action; but that the Duke of Savoy, with whom he was, was of opinion, that he might make a more advantagious progress along the Rhone, than in any other quarter, and promised to give the enemy a good diversion in his: But all these designs were projected with reference to the taking of the Fort of Ré, of which there was not the least umbrage of a doubt. The Duke of Rohan took this Express into consideration, and would willingly have made his first Exploits in those quarters, had he not been necessitated to reclaim the Towns of Rohergue, and the higher Languedoc, who in his absence had been inveigled into resolutions contrary to his, and their determinations also sent to the King; fo that nothing but his presence was capable to make them take Arms; which fixed him in his former purposes, for which he fent Montague his Reasons, affuring him however, that, if the Duke of Savoy would instantly take the Field, he would quit all other designs to joyn Forces with him; but that otherwise it would be expedient to remit that Affair till another time: And so, leaving the Baron D' Aubais, to command the lower Languedoc, and a Council in the Sevenes, to govern their Affairs there; he marched with his whole Force, composed of four thousand five hundred Foor, and two hundred Horse, directly towards Millaud; and in his March, took Pont D' Arre, a private Gentlemans house, and Arigas a Church that was fortified, and very much incommoded the Bayliwick of Vigan; whiles he stayed at Saint Fohn De Breuill, Alterac, and Guerin, two of his Partisans in Millaud came to meet, and disswade him from that attempt, alledging the difficulties attending it, and that as soon as Montau-ban and Castres had declared, they would do the like.

The Duke told them they had done very ill to come out of the Town, which they had left to the disposal of those that were disaffected to them; that it would be the ruine of his designs, and a President for all the Towns of Rouergue to shut their Gates against him; that he could not begin with Montauban, and Castres; for that Millaud lay directly in his way to them; and that he was resolved with all his Troops to get in, or ravage their whole Countrey; desiring them to go before, and give them notice of it: But they found how their absence had encouraged the adverse party, who having that the Gates of the Town, and those of the Bridge over the River Tarn, where they must of necessity pass, they could not obtain a re-admittance, but were enforced to return to the Duke with the newes; which yet stopped him not, who well faw the necessity of profecuting this design; hoping that the sight of him would animate the people to an insurrection; who sailed not his expectation: For having with much difficulty and peril, by reason of the depth, and largeness of the River, passed over some of his Guards, who laying at the Gates of the Bridge on both sides, they at length fell down, and gave him free passage to the Suburbs, where taking some Horse, and his Trumpets, and in that Equipage marching round the Townshe so excited the people, that under the favour of the night, without any opposition, they meet all with their Armes, and forcing the Confuls to open the Gates, went themselves to conduct him into the Town.

This success made him way into all the Towns of Reviergue, 142 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book IV. and of the Mountain of Albigeois, except Braffae, and Saint Felix Tower, where he left some Regiments with Vacqueresse, who had already blocked up this Tower, and having sprung a Mine, took it upon composition; whereupon Brassac, at the end of four and twenty hours yielded also: But Saint Germier, who carried on his business at Castres, behaved himself so ill, that he suffered himself, with all his Confidents to be turned out of the Town: This President made Realmont, Briteste, and the three Towns of Lauraguais; viz. Puylaurens, Revel, and Soreze refuse also to declare; so that he was fain to come with his Cavalry to Roque-Courbe, a little Town, about one League distant from Castres, and two from Realmont; whence he made several Esfayes to reduce those two refractory places; at Castres he prevailed nothing at all; at Realmont his perswasions met a more civil reception, and their Gates, that refuled the Duke of Monimovency, admitted him; there he placed Maugis Governour, who had been most active in doing him this service, and very faithful to him in the precedent Wars.

The reduction of this place was some enlargement to him; thither he summoned the Colloque of Albigeois, which he wrought to resolutions conformable to his own; but before he could advance any farther, Puylaurens, or Revel must of necessity be secured otherwise it were impossible he should adventure to go either to Montauban, or into Foix, being to march twelve or fifteen Leagues in an enemies Countrey, and that over great Plains too, having the Duke of Montmorency attending on him, who had drawn together the whole strength of the Country to fight him, and was alwayes double or treble stronger in Horse than he; it was once in his thoughts to cross the Tarn, but the late abundance of rain had made it unfordable; so that having no way but that of Lauraguais, and an Army before him, he could not put himself upon the hazard of that passage without some place of retreat. He begins therefore with Puylaurens, as a place whose example would invite all the rest; Terrieux, and Mauris, two, whose good services in the former Wars, made him repote a great confidence in, promifed, that if he would give them five hundred piftols to di-Aribute in the Town, they would procure his admittance; bur, instead of performing what they had engaged themselves to do, they betray the whole design to the Duke of Montmorency, to the end he might furprize Caffagne, who with his own, and the Baron d' Aletz his company, and fifty of the Duke of Rohan's Guards . were commanded to execute it; to whom, when they came to the appointed Rendez-vous, the Traytors fent word, that it was not in their power to effect what they had undertaken; the others feeing themselves themselves far from any retreat, Causse Caucallier, who had very good acquaintance, and Gaillard, a brother, in Revel, who with Des-Isles-Maisons were carrying on an infallible design there, and which wanted only two dayes to be put in execution, searing the inconveniencies threatned by the great length of their retreat, made a desperate proposal to anticipate the time, and attempt it presently, which they all affented to, and succeeded so well in, that the people of Revel seeing Rohans Livery, imagining he himself was there, and Gaillard's brother, with some other of the Inhabitants, having seized upon a Tower, favoured their Escalade, in which they met with no other opposition than some stones thrown at them: Thus they became Masters of the Town, the news of which made the Duke of Rohan refolve, inftantly, and without any further delay to advance.

In order to which he caused fourty thousand loaves to be made, and leaving Roque-Courbe came with part of his forces, and lay at Arifat, a house not above halfe a League from Castres; the next day he marched to Narrez, where he appointed his general Rendez-vous, and quarters that night at Sajes, where he had intelligence that the Duke of Montmorency with all his troops lay between him and Revel, whereupon, to differeumber himself of all the Carts he had to carry it, he distributed all the bread among his fouldiers; and the next day having marched about a League, he discovered the Duke of Montmorency, with three or four hundred horse only: whereupon he rallies his men, and in good order marches in fight of him, keeping on his way to Revel, without any rencontre at all, and quartered about a League from Revel. where he arrived the next day early. The Duke of Montmorency takes up his quarters at Saint Felix, and other adjacent places, whence he might get the advantage of the way, whether he took that of Montauban, or of Foix.

The Duke of Roban, in the meane time, intercepts a Letter written by the Confuls of Mazeres, and addressed to the President de Suc, importing the inclinations of that Town to joyne with the Resormed party, but that the Duke's presence was very requisite to promote the publique Declaration of their intentions; which he took into his serious consideration, and reslecting upon this, that he had yet three dayes march before his Army could reach Mantauban, no retreat upon the way, that his journey thicher was not necessary, the English being engaged in other parts, and having good assurance of the entire affections of that Town, he thought sit to embrace this offered opportunity of reducing the whole Countrey of Foix to his party; This made him resolve upon that course, and, that he might get the start of the enemy, having caused his Souldiers to take bread for two dayes, and quit part of their baggage, he parts from Revel at midnight; but by reason of the badnesse of the weather that night, and the incommodious advenews of the Village, where his foot lay, it was day before his Reare could get out of it; so that passing by Montcausfor, where a troop of horse of the enemies were quartered, notice of their march towards Foix being given, it occasioned a flight skirmish, which yet retarded not the armies march: The same troop followed his Reare at a distance, till they came neare to a little Town called Soville, two Leagues from Revel, where the Duke of Montmorency was ranging his troops in Battalia, as conceiving it the most proper place to oppose the Duke of Robin's passage, and fight him, by reason of a fair plain beneath it, very advantageous for his Cavalry, in which he was much superiour, and of a little, but very dangerous brook, all whose bridges he had broken down fo that he could not passe but in sight of him.

The Duke whose Army consisted of four thousand foot, & fifteen hundred good horse, made four Battalions of his Infantry, which he ranged in formes of Lozenges, leaving great intervals between them for his Cavalry who faced the enemies army, and could, as they marched, be easily ordered to charge them either in Front, Flanck, or Reare; and his baggage placed he in the middest of the four Battalions, re folving in that order either to passe, or fight him; But enquiring of his guides, if there were no other paffage over the brook but that which the enemy possessed, they informed him, that upon the left hand of him there was a Ford near a little Castle, called de Fean, where the brook being narrow, there might easily be a bridge made for the passage of the foot: Thither then marched he directly, leaving the Duke of Montmorency's Army on his right hand, and when he had gotten beyond him, very opportunely sends to take the Castle, which two hundred souldiers of Castelnaudary were coming to possesses, and would mightily have incommoded his passage. This done he disencumbers himself of his baggage, which he sent before over the brook to the Castle, and having gained a little hill, between the enemy and the brook, halts there, to observe the countenance of the Duke of Montmorency, and considering what he were best to do; Once he thought not to quit the advantage of that place, fearing to march over the brook by day, in view of an army that fought all advantages to encounter him, and might suffer as many as they pleased of his men to get over, and then charge the rest: On the other side, confidering, that if he stayed there without provisions, in an enemies Countrey, an army attending him, and having five long Leagues to Mazeres, he feared it would be too great a burthen for his fouldiers to support, so that, by the advice of all his Officers, he refolved to expose himself rather to the hazard of a battel, than the miferies of toyle and famine; and when the bridge was made, marched towards it, in the aforesaid equipage. Auzon who had the command of a troop of horse, and was nearest the Duke of Montmorency's Army, being placed upon a hillock, that gave him the prospect of the whole Countrey every way, let the Army advance too far before him, before he began to draw off; so that he was charged by two hundred Horse, who pursued him home to his Foot in great disorder, and had like to have Routed them too; but the Duke of Rossar's Guards, who were very opportunely on foot, and ready to relieve him, gave them a Volley, and at the same instant a sharp charge, and repulse; this beginning much animated Minimorency's Army, part of his Cavalry, with his Foot also, advancing with great shouts to the charge; but receiving a second repulse, and two of the Duke of Roban's Battaillons coming up, with their Pikes charged directly to them, the Foot stayed not to expect them; but flying, cast away their Arms, and quitted the Field; they were closely purfued up to a Work, which hindred our discovery of what was on the other fide of it, and faved the enemy from an entire defeat: For the Duke of Rohan would not suffer his min to make any consused pursuit, because the Duke of Mentmorency, who had not yet come up to the charge, was beyond that Work, with above three hundred Horse in Bartalla; but commanded Leques only toadvance, to observe their posture.

The Duke of Montmorency, when he had rallied his Men. drew them off to Soville', and there Ranged them again in Battaila, but without any femblance of renewing the Fight: The Duke of Rohan, for his part, kept the Field more than a long houre, caused his dead to be buried, and thanks to be given to God; and then, without any interruption, passed the Brook, and kept on his way; but could not reach Mazeres till the next day at Noon, after he had been forty houres on horse-back: In this Fight he lost Causse-Caucallier, one of his Life-guard, one of his Pages, two Lieutenants of Foot, five or fix Souldiers, and had thirty or forty wounded. Of the Duke of Montmo ency's party, were I st many more, yet was it no bloody Incounter; and it is to be believed that this engagement of his was rather occasional, than before determined; for it seems he had more reason to charge the Duke of Robbe in his pailinge over the Brooks than in any other part: Put'is easier to correct the actions of others, when a man is out of danger of the blowes, than in the action it felf, which requires a prompt and sudden execution, and af146 The Memoires of the Dake of Rohan. fords not leasure to perpend, and weigh all events. The Duke of Montmorency had, at this Rencontre, but three thousand Foot, but he had fix, or seven hundred Horse of his own, besides all the Gentry of quality of Languedoc, Rouergue, Foix, and some from beyond the Garonne.

When the Duke of Rohan came to Mageres, all his men oppressed with hunger, lassitude, and want of sleep, for refreshment, he found the gates thut against him, and the Magistrates utterly averse to receive him; but the common people at length took heart, and in spight of the Consuls, and most potent Inhabitants, let him in; where, after he had taken the best order he could for quartering of his Horse, he made provision for his Foot also. When the Duke of Montmorency heard of the indisposition of the people of Foix to joyne with the Duke of Roban's Forces; he came and took up his quarters at Saint Gallelle upon the River Cers, which runs to Mazeres, a good league distant from Saverdun, whence he sent to inform them, that he was come thither with his Army for their affiftance, that they should be of good courage, and not suffer themselves to be caught by the allurements of the Duke of Roban; who for eight dayes together, was oppressed with the extremity of keeping all his Army upon his own expence, and yet could he hardly furnish his Foot with one loaf a day each one; having no other place in Foix besides Mazeres, and the River Riege swollen to a height, that making it unfordable, cut off all communication with the upper Foix: So, that had these inconveniencies lasted but a few dayes longer, he had been in danger of perishing by Famine if he flayed; or by the Sword, if he returned; having no Ammunition to defend himself withall: All these necessities pressing him, he founded so many Fordes, till at length having found one between Saverdun, and Pamicz, which the Duke of Montmorency could not so suddenly reach, he resolves in this desperate condition, to make an attempt on Saverdun, where he knew the people were well-affected to him, and the lower Town being easie to be forced, he hoped that when he had taken that, fear would induce the other to an accommodation with him; which project had a wished success: To this end, he marches by night from Mageres with a part of his Troops, and at break of day pafses the Ford; but with great difficulty for the Foot, by reason of the swiftness, and extream coldness of the River, which then also was swelled so high, that some of his Souldiers, and many of his Arms were lost in it; so that at last the Horse were necessigated to transport the remaining Foot behind them; which done, he marches strait to Saverdun; where first, by a Trumper he fummoned

fummoned the Inhabitants to open their Gates; and upon their refusal advances, and, after some Volleys of small shot, which neither slew, nor hurt any one, with the affisfance of some honest persons of the Town, Ladders were mounted, and the place entrod: The taking of the lower Town, much consounded the ill-affected; some slie, others hide themselves, at length all cry our for mercy; and the higher Town also was surrendred on the 12th, of Novemb-1627.

The same day Faucon, by the Duke of Rohan's order, with two hundred Men, secured Montmaur, a small Town, and Castle lying between Revil, and Mazeres; but of great consequence for the uniting Lauraguais, and Foix: This was effected by the intelligence of La Barte, whom the Duke of Montmorency had highly disgusted.

The Duke vigoroufly profecutes thefe fortunate fuccesses, and upon hopes of some Correspondents in Pamiez, on the 22th. of the same Month he shewes h mself with his Horse before it, but had no other encertainment than what they fent him from their Musquets; whereupon he determined, the night following clap a Petarde to the Wall, to which he was induced by some of the Inhabitants, that had given him a meeting near the Town; instead then of returning to Saverdun, whither he was going he retires to a Covert, half a league from Pamiez, forbidding his men to make any fires; thither he commands Goudin and Malmoirac, with their Regiments, whom he had before ordered to be in a readiness; but those that should have come out of the Town to conduct him to the place, and inform him of the true ftate of it, came not to the Rendez-vous; nevertheles Bruel one of the Town, Author of this enterprise, and who knew well enough where the Petarde was to be fixed, being with him, he proceeded in the deligned attempt, which was executed after this manner. Caffagne had the command and conduct of the Peterds, which were carried by Gentlemen of his own, and some Officers of his Horse, who were seconded by Leques with thirty armed Men, and fifty choice Pikes, and Musquetiers; after whom marched Goudin, and Malmoirac, then the Duke of Roban him. felf in person: In this Equipage they come up to the Wall, where, notwithstanding the Allarme, and Volleys of shot, the first Petarde was fixed, but the Breach being not large enough, a second, was clapped on, which extended it to a sufficient wideness for an armed man to pass; whither the Inhabitants flocking to defend the Breach, Bazier the Engineer, took a small Granade, and threw it in through the Hole among, them, where it broke, and spoiled the Thigh of one of the Defendants, and diffipated the relts rest; which gave the Assailants opportunity to enter the Breach; the first that entred, was La Tini Gerestoux; the second, was the Baron of Villemade, and after them, the whole Party. The taking of the Town in this manner, spread so universal a terrour over Foix, that some Forts, well stored with all necessaries, gave themselves up for fear. After this the Duke was received into the Mas d' Azil, and Carlat, by which means he reduced all those, that were of the Religion in the County of Fax, to his party; and probably had done much more, had the English enterprizes in the Isle of Re prospered; whom it will be now expedient to look after.

The negligence of the English, gave opportunity to thirteen Barks, laden with provisions, to come up to the Citadel, where they arrived the fixth of September, about the Morning, and got off again the ninth following, carrying with them all the wounded and unuseful persons: The easie passage of these, encouraged others to the like adventure; but, the Guards being re-inforced by the Rochellers, some of them were taken, and severely dealt withall; and on the last of September, of fifteen or fixteen Backs which came up, feven were taken, and the rest put to flight.

On the twelfth of September came from England a Renfort of fifteen or fixteen hundred Souldiers, with a fupply of all other necessaries; whereupon the Duke resolved to attempt the little Fort De la Piéc, and turned some of his Canon that way; but this defign was dashed upon a sudden, no man knows why.

On the fixth of October, the belieged, pressed by strong neceffities, sent out Montand with offers to capitulate, in case they were not relieved with victuals the next day: This obliged us to double our Guards, and, as the winde fate, it was easie to conjecture that the relief could not come but from O'onth; whereupon some ships were commanded out to meet them, and prevent their pailinge; but, instead of thur, the Captain of the Guard took another courses and went with his ships to the Fosse de l'Oye, while three and thirty Barks, solzing the opportunity passed withcut interruption, and nine and twenty of them came up under the Citadel; where yet it is to be noted, that they could not come near the Land, but upon a great Flood, which comes but every fifteen dayes, by reason whereof the English might yet with much facility, have destroyed the relief; which though arrived, yet could not be unladen; forthat Propositions were made to the Duke, affaulting them on both fides by Landago fire the Barks with what was in them: which might have been done without any prejudice received from the Castle, by reason of the height of the

Banks capable to shelter the Affailants: He seemed to approve of this motion, but rook no course to put it in act; contenting himself only with trifling away the time in vain attempts to fire

When the relief was gotten in, Buckingham calls a Council, who resolve to draw eff; so that on the twelsth of October, they began to re-imbarque their Armes, and other Ammunitions the had upon the Land: After this he fent for a Gentleman beionging to the Duke of Soubize, to whom he declared that the Council of War, confidering how well the place was stored with all necessaries, the year so far spent, his Army much diminished, and all his Provisions confumed, had conceived it necesfary to draw off; The Gentleman endeavoured to diffwade him from that resolution, shewing him that the Fleet which the Earl of Holland was conducting to them, would furficiently repaire all those necessities; that the relief the Besieged had received could not last long; and that if vigilant guards were kept, they would be soon reduced to their former extremities; that his retreat now he had engaged them, would be the loss and ruine of the Rochellers, who would cast all their displeasure and odium upon the Duke of Soubize, as the Authour of their destruction, and that it would be an irreparable dif-reputation to the King his Masters Arms, to have attempted such an enterprise with so little hono and profit.

To all which Aguments he gave no other answer, than that his Captains would hay no longer; but yet, if the Earl of Holland came time enough, with his Fleet, he would endeavour to alter their minds: By which the Gentleman concluding that the Duke was fixed in his resolutions to be gone, gave speedy notice of it to the Duke of Soubize, who ever fince the middle of September had lain fick at Rochelle of a tertian Ague joyned with a great vomiting, desiring him, if possible, to post thicher; which he did, and at his arrival in the Isle of Ré, uses all his Art to perswade the Duke of Buckingham and his Officers into a better humour, of which they gave him some small hopes; but he, nevertheless, seeing them still carrying their things aboard, assured himself they would not budge from their some purposes.

The King, in the mean time, being recovered of his fickness, comes in person before Rochelle; where his presence raised both the number and spirits of his Army, and upon intelligence how the Duke of Buckingham's was lessened, resolves to make a discent into the list of Ré under the protection of the little Fort de la Prée, which had still held out. On the other side the English

150 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book IV. men's defire to return, having made them very careless of their guards, they suffered seven or eight pinnaces to steal up towards the Fort, and on the fixteenth of October they land four hundred men; the twenty seventh there came up ten more, and on the thirtieth five and twenty; whereupon the Dake of Buckingham rallies his Men; and, quitting the greatest part of the Trenches, marches by night, with what horse and foot he had, to preventa discent already made, commanding out a forlorne of French, which not being seconded, were enforced to retire. The Merchants of Richelle in the mean time, feeing what preparations were made for his return; instantly sollicite the Duke to give them fifty or fixty tunnes of Corn he had upon the Shore, which he affented not to, till they had no leafure to carry it off, so that they fell to the enemies share: But before his departure, to shew that he had left nothing unattempted, he resolved to make one estay more, which resolution he grounded upon the report of some fugitives from the Fort, who averred that there were but eight hundred fouldiers in it, and those too for the greatest part fick; that the Courtain towards the Sea had neither graffe nor Rampart, so that if he mounted his Ladders on that side, it might be easily forced. Without any further information, or battering the Parapetts, he resolves to give a general aslault, proposes it to the French Officers, defiring them to dispose the English Colonels to it, and in case they should stick at it, he would then make use of his power to command them. The attempt thus refolved on, he prepares his men for the florm, a flighing the English and Irish their post on the land side, and the French mixed with English towards the Sea: Manuel conducted the tensifies Ladders, but could mount but two, though his party behaved themselves with much gallantry and resolution; (but to attempt to force by Escalade above fifteen hundred Men in a Fort with four Bassions, well furnished with Artillery, and all other necessaries, was a way eternally to discourage his Souldiers, rather than to lead them on to the purchase of any honour) but leaving many dead, and carrying off more wounded, they were forced

This repulse, together with the intelligence of the hourly encrease of the forces in the Fort de la Prée, hastned the Duke of Buckingham's raising the Siege, and his retreat to the Bay de l'Oye, to ship his men with more leasure and security: On the eight of November early in the morning the Drums beat for their departure at moon, and scarcely was the Rear Guard get out of the Town, but the King's Army appeared much stronger in Horse, and equal to the others in Foot; having this stronger in Horse, and equal to the others in Foot; ther advantage, to purfue a retreating Army, and feize all occasions which either the incommodity of the passes, or the usual disorders that attend such rerteats might favour them with. At the pass de la Coharde, they made as though they would have charged them, but observing the good order of the English, and the advantage they had of the ground, after a long halt, both Armies marched off, the English keeping the plain, and the King's Forces the Sea coast: Beyond this pass was a hollow way, which croffing the Marsh, extended it felf as far as the Bridge de l' Oye: At the entring of this the Squadrons began to be somewhat preffed, and to stand upon their defence; but the Van, and then the Body being got into it, the Rear-guard, charged by the Marshal Schomberg, was easily routed; in which defeat the English lost seven or eight hundred men, but the night approaching, favoured their imbarquing of the rest.

In this action the Duke of Buckingham committed two great errours; one was, The committing his retreat to the charge of fourfcore Horfe, which being forced in upon the Rear of their own Troops, broke, and confounded them; the other was, His omission to raise a Fort, or some other defenceable work at the entry of that hollow way, where he had still designed to make his retreat in case of necessity, which would absolutely have secured it.

At his departure, he affures the Rochellers of his speedy return to their deliverance, with a more numerous and better fortified Fleet, alledging the inconvenience of the feafon, and defect of provisions, as the only causes that obliged him to draw off; and promifing them a quick and abundant supply of all necessaries for a long defence; and further defires some of their Merchants to follow him into England, that they might testifie the integrity of his affection and diligence, and that they might themfelves carry back the effects of his promifes. Nevertheless when he drew near the Coast of England, himself took a fly-boat, fending the Rochelle Merchants to expect him at Briftol, desiring the Duke of Soubize to do the same at Portsmouth, where he would be as foon as he; and then steers his course towards Plymouth, where the Earl of Holland's Fleet rode. When he came thither, he gave order that the ships that there lay ready, and laden with Corn for the Rochellers, should be discharged, and the Provisions fold, upon pretence that they would be spoyled; which done he gets before to pre possess the spirit of the King of great Britain, rejecting the blame of the errours committed in the expedition on those were no way culpable; So that when the Merchants came to exhibite their complaints against him, they were informed, it was the next way to make their condition And when they importuned him for a quick dispatch of the provisions for the Rochellers, the Duke of Buckingham used no other excuse to answer their sollicitations, than that they were fold; and that which more amazed them, was his carrying away three hundred Tun of Corn, which he might have left them, till they could have been better stored. But notwithstanding all this, the Merchans addressed themselves to the King of England himself; to whom they represented their imminent danger, and the great preparations making to confummate their ruine; imploring his Majesty to favour them with a good and speedy recruit of Victuals, that being the greatest want that afflicted them; which once supplied, there was nothing else which they much feared: But if their enemies had leafure to block up their Port, their destruction was inev table: All which the King answered with promises of a powerful and speedy relicf, asfuring them morcover, that he would hazard all the Forces of his Kingdom, rather than fuffer them to perish.

While they expect the effect of these promises, the Rochelters distratche their Admiral Bregneau with money, and express command to buy Coin, to lade both his own, and those other thips they had already in England, and to return with it with all speed: David, who was sent after him, with the like Committion, stores his thips with provisions, and very happily got back with them in o Rochelle: But Bragneau, instead of executing his Commission, goes directly from Plymou b, where all things were ready for him, to Purt (mouth, under colour of furnishing himself at a better rate; and yet instead of doing that, goes to London, where puft up with vanity derived from the promises of the Duke of Buckingham, he minded nothing but anambitious and coverous pursuit of the honour and profit of the Admiralty of the refugiated French, which at length he obtained, by the voluntary demission of it, which the Duke of Soubige made of it, in favour of the Rochellers, and to eafe them of the extraordinary expences they were at; and yet notwithstanding, all the instant, and dayly sollicitations made to him to that purpose, could not induce him to be gone, till the difficulties of the passage grew so great, that he was at last forced to wait the departure of the other Fleet preparing for their relief.

This was the issue of this expedition of the Duke of Buckingbans, in which he wracked both his own and his Countreys honor, confumed much of the Rochellers provisions, and ruined the party he came to relieve.

The hopes this Victory gave the King of carrying the Town, made him more intent upon the Siege: The whole winter he spent in investing it by Land with Forts, Redoubts, and lines of Communication, and straightning it at Sea by a Bar extending from the point of Coreilles to Fort Lewis, 2 in which he spared neither cost nor pains.

The Bonfires the Romanists made throughout the whole Country of Foix, gave the Duke of Rohan the first light of these missortunes, the certainty of which was afterwards confirmed by an express from the Duke of Soub ze, who encouraged him still with hopes that, the next Spring they should return in a condition to wipe off the stains this affront had cast upon them.

At the same time the Duke of Roban received two several Advertisements from the lower Languedoc; one was, that the Marquess de Portes, who had many confederates in the Colloque of Saint Oremain, having corrupted the Garison in the Castle of Florac, and gotten them to declare openly for him; Montredon, chief of the faid Colloque, hafte ! thither, and calling in the whole Province to his aide, had befreged the Castle, and in fight of the Marquels de Portes, who was come with two thousand men to relieve it, sprung two Mines, stormed, and forced it to furrender: The other was, that the Prince of Conde was coming down the Rhone towards the lower Languedoc, and that Briton was in Treaty with him about the Province of Vivaretz, which he fought by all means to intimidate; urging the Duke of Roban's absence, and at so great a distance from them as an argument to inforce his defign: This made him confider that it was best to preserve what they were already Masters of; conceiving that if he wintered in Foix, he should bring a famine on the Countrey, which had already had but a bad year, and was so little, and so remote from their other quarters, that if the Prince of Coudé on one hand, and the Duke d' Espernon on the other, should joyn with the Duke of Montmorency, he should be blocked up on all fides: That if he went to Montauban it would be to small purpose, for that the English were now gone, and the Winter was come on, and moreover that there was no possibility for him to return thence again; so that he conceived the securest way was, to return towards the lower Languedoc to oppose the Prince of Condéthere, and so preserve that Countrev.

But before his departure, he convened the Colloque of Foix, settles Beaufort in the Government of it, to the great satisfaction and joy of the Inhabitants; leaving with him his own Regiment (which confisted yet of eight hundred men) and his own Troop of light Horse-men; makes Rousschiere Governour of Saverdun; took order for the fortifying of some places, of which there were three very considerable, to wit Mazeres, Saverdun, and Carlat; and as for the Mas d'Azi', the good fortune they had to withstand the former Siege, gave them courage again to

The only perplexity he had was for Paniez, being a great Town, not fortifiable, nor well peopled of it felf; nor indeed were those enough of the Religion in all Foix to man it as it ought: The right course had been to dismantle it; but Men, with whom in Warres of such a nature a man must of necessity comply, are hardly perswaded to things of that kinde: But although this remedy could not be applied, yet he prevailed so far upon the Inhabitants, as to fortise a quarter of their Town called la Marcadal, very conveniently seated, where he designed a handsom fortiseation; which done he appoints his General Rendez-vous at Mazeres, whence he marches by night, and returning the same

The Duke of Montmorency having notice of his motion, goes to wait for him on the great Road to Montauban, whence he suddenly retired again to his quarters. The Duke goes from Revel to the higher Languedoc, where re-affembling the Colloque he informed them of all he had done in Foix; encourages them to a constant perseverance in their fidelity; and establishes a Council for the direction of their affaires, untill such time, as he could fend them a President for the Colloque, there being no man among them, that the rest would give place to, for that the Marquess of Malauze who had been formerly their President, and would, without dispute, have again been accepted of, was now wholly bent against their Party; the Court having prevailed so farre upon him, as to make him oppose the Duke of Roban inthat Province; which that he might the better do, he faines a defire to be reconciled with him, which he fignifies by Letter to Beaufort; and afterwards, at his first meeting with the Duke, discovering some displeasure, that Castres was not yet Joyned with the Party, protested that as soon as that Town, and Montauban, should do so, and that a General Assembly was formed, he would also publiquely declare for them. This had a pestilent influence on the weaker fort, and gave the dis-affected among them, an opportunity to work much mischief among the people; For neither the Declarations of Montauban and Cafires, nor the convening of a general Assembly wrought any change at all in him, who continued still an enemy to the Reformed gage in the War.

After this the Duke returns towards the Scuenes, and when he came to Vigan, received very urgent dispatches from Vivaretz, with intelligence that Brifon had quitted all the higher Vivaretz, upon the approach of the Prince of Conde (although for want of Canon, he was not in a capacity to force the most inconfiderable Fott there) who had burnt and pillaged that poor Countrey; and that, if they had not speedy relief, it was to be feared that Privas, and the lower Vivaretz, would make their peace, to which Brifon earnestly incited them; but upon notice of the Duke's return, and that he was coming in person to their relief, they re-assumed their courages, and maugre all Brison's diffwafions, resolved to stand upon their guard; which obliged the Prince to pass into the lower Languedoc; whither where the Duke also came, he met with some Souldiers of Nismes, who had seized the Castle of Vouvert, which he caused them to quit, upon the advance of the Prince, who seemed to have an intentionto befiege it; unwilling to give him any occasion to stop there, knowing that his orders were to pass into the higher Languedoc, and that his stay would prejudice a design he had upon the Citadel of Montpellier, which Bretigny David, for fix months together, had managed with the Baron de Meslay, his Kinsman, and intimate friend; and eldest Captaine of the Regiment of Normandy, then in Garison in Montpellier.

Now, forasimuch as upon the arrival of de Fosse, the Regiments of Normandy and Picardy were to be drawn out of the Town, and others to be placed there in their rooms; Messay who had there married one of the Religion, seemed much discontented at this alteration; and that he had not left his own to embrace the Reformed Party: Bretigny, on the other side, who very well knew his ambition, cherishes him in this humour, and at length tells him, that if he could contrive a way to make himself Master of Montpellier, it would be then in his own power to make himself satisfaction, and that withal he would be received into a Party, from which, by that means, he might obtaine whatever his own wishes could suggest to his Hopes. The other listens to him, and demands time to consider both of the thing, and the means to effect it, and both together contrived expedients for mutual Interviews, and conveying intelligence, without suspinion, one to the other. Not long after he tells him he was now resolved to undertake the business; Treats with him concerning the advantages and conditions he expected from the Reformed Party, and shews him the way he had to make himself Master of the Citadel; to wit, that being on the Guard every fourth day with his own Company, he could, with much ease, let in as many as he pleased into it: That for assume the design was to be put in execution he would advance an hundred paces from the Citadel towards Bretigny, to yield himself up into his hands.

When all these things were communicated to the Duke of Roban, he very well liked of them, for that the two lines of Communication, which conjoyned the Town with the Citadel, being made, and the Town Wall that separated them razed, as they were now at work upon it, the Town would not be able to defend it felf; but withal he declared that he would never attempt this design, till that Wall were down, or, at least, great breaches were made in it, that so one and the same action might put them in possession both of Town and Citadel. The design thus concluded on, the Duke, for some dayes, deferres march: But seeing they proceeded too flowly in raising the Walls, he departs, and advancing a little way from Koque-Courbe to pass into Foix, Meslay sends Bretigny word, that the affaire was now in a very good posture, and that it was necessary it should be put in execution, before the Garison in the Citadel was changed; Whereupon he is disparched into the Sevenes, and the lower Languedoe, with all necessary instructions tending to the executing of the defign, and an express charge particularly to impart it to Montredon, and to none else: all was delayed till the arrival of the Duke of Rohan, to whom they then made new Propositions, that, at the same time the Citadel should be attempted without, he should storm the Town with two thousand Men, and also scale the Walls of Communication, alledging, that when they should be Masters of the Ciradel, the time they must have to pass three or four thousand Men, through one gate, would give the Town too much leafure to arm themselves. This made him somewhat more cold in the business, and gave him great suspicions of the treachery intended; whereupon he continued firm in hisformer resolution; in so much as Bretigny complained that he found him so refractory in a business able to revive their drooping Party: But he demonmonftrated to him the danger of this last proposal, and that being once Master of the Citadel, nothing could hinder his taking of the Town also.

While the Prince of Condé was upon his March towards the higher Langu doc, the Duke of Rohan Rallies his Forces, appointing the Rendez-vous to be on the 19th, of Jimuary a little above Claret, five leagues from Montpellier; where about two of the clock in the Afternoon, there met fix thousand fighting men: Thence he sent a party of Horse to advance before the rest of the Army, as far as the Bridge of Salefon, which is about a league from Monipellier, to intercept all fuch as might give any notice of his approach: And then commands B. etigny, chief of the enterprise, to maich with the Van, confisting of fif een hundred Men, and divided into fix Squadrons; the three first were composed each one of thirty armed men, called out of the Voluntiers, and out of the best of the Cavalry, with Halberds and Piftols; and of fourscore others, half-Fikes, half-Musquitiers; every ten armed Men had their Officer, and carried with them Perardes, and Ladders, to force the Court of Guard in the Cleadel; and two grea Forks to keep up the Portcullis; the other three Troops were composed of four nundred men, each one; and were ordered for a Referve to the other: After thefe, marched the Duke with his Men at Armes, followed by all the other Squadrons, the biggest of which consisted not of above four; or five hundred men. When they came to the Bridge of Saleson, they found there the Bason de Messay's Man, who asfured Bretigny that all went well; whereupon, leaving all their Baggage on the other side of the Bridge of Suleson, with a hundred Souldiers only to guard it, they advance as far as the Bridge called Favenal, which is about a Canon shot from Montpellier: Bretigny, by a bold Souldier, gives notice of his arrival to his Coufin, who so well knew how to fool him, that he returned with an affurance that all was well, and in a good condition, and that there was no difficulty in the matter: Whereupon he proceeds, not minding at all what had been so often recommended to him not to enter the place untill M. flay was come forth to him, and had pur himfelf into his hands; but his impatient defire to execute fo brave a defign, animates him, without this precaution, to enter the Citadel with fix or feven and thirty men; those within not daring to let any more come in: For as foon, as they faw them plant their Forks to support the Portcullis, they cut a cord, by which means the Bridge was drawn up, and a Trav-doo, opened, whence most of those that were gotten in fell down into a Trench, where they were all harque-busiered, the Musquitters at the lame tuac 158 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book IV.

time playing on those without; Montredon, who in Bretigny's absence was to command, and had received a charge to be at the Gate, and see them all enter in good order, drew off the Troops, and gave the Duke notice of their success, who had drawn uphis whole Body in Battaila on the right, and left hand of the great Road-way, which he had left open for the retreat of those of the Van; who when they were all passed, he returned to the Bridge of Saleson, where making an Halt, he Rallied his Men, and then drew off into the Plains between Montpellier, and Lunel, quartering his Men in the best Villages thereabouts; not any one stirring out of Montpellier to pursue him, or observe his March. The next day he gave leave to the Troops, that came from the Sevexes to depart; and marched with those of the lower Languedoe, to Saint Gilles, where he thought to have mide an attempt upon that Garrison, but the violence of the cold forced him to fend his Men into quarters.

This was the issue of that enterprise, in which Bretigny, and his brother were sain, with about twenty others, and fixteen or seventeen more were taken prisoners.

This Winter was the Dake of Rohan hardly pressed both in the upper Languedoc, and in Vivaretz; in the former of which was the Prince of Cordé; who whil'st he prepared to invade the Province by open force, endeavoured also by secret practices to undermine the constancy of those Towns that had declared for the Reformed Party; so that the Duke of Robaits presence there, with his Forces, was absolutely necessary: And on the other side Vivaretz, fince the Prince his March through it, was in a miferable condition; the higher Vivaretz being loft, with all that the Duke held upon the Rhone: And besides all this, the Duke of Ventadour in his Seigniories, and Messargues in those he held in right of his Wife, used extream cruelties, and violences against those of the Religion, seizing on their Estates, torturing their Bodies with Whips, and Bastinadoes, driving them to Masse; so that there came thence, to the Duke, frequent dispatches, and Deputies, one upon the heels of another, to implore his presence, and the assistance of his Forces, to restore them to their liberty, which otherwise they should be inforced to purchase at any rate; considering also the divisions between all the Nobility of that Countrey, and Bisson; affuring him also that they had taken care for the quartering of his Troops, as long as their necessity should require their stay there.

There happened yet another accident which much obstructed this Voyage; to wit, the unexpected death of Brison, which

Book IV. The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. much enlarged the former divisions; for if the Nobility refused to submit to Bitson, who had been already twice Governour of the Province, much more would they oppose his brother chevrides, a young man, of small experience, and far short of his brothers conduct to govern the Province: On the other fide the faction of Brifor, which was the most prevalent in Privas, and Privas the most considerable place of all Vivareix, chose Chevvilles for their Governour; for that, being conscious of his weakness, they thought to rule all more absolutely, than under his brother, and to allow him what part they pleased, in the administration of the Affairs: To which must be added, that the Province of the lower Languedoc, which was to advance the Leavy-money, being highly interested in the preservation of Vivaretz, and blocking up the Rhone, it being a River that with great facility and speed could convey all forts of Arms, and Ammunition to the enemy, preferred this design, before that of the higher Languedoc; for which place Rohan had raifed two Regiments, of five hundred Men apiece, which was all they defired, in case he could not come himself in person: But the untoward humour of Faucon, to say no worse, much retarded this relief; for being defigned for that expedition, after he had promifed to go, and for that reason had received more Advance-money than was usually allowed; he endeavoured to corrupt his Captains, that so he might reject his merited blame on them; but being not able to prevail on more than one, he was at length constrained to declare openly that he would not go at all; fo that the Duke could fend but eight of those Companies with Caumette-Chamband, who commanded the other Regiment: But by reason of these difficulties, protractions, and the artifices used by Faucon to withdraw both Officer, and Souldier from this Voyage, those eight Companies could never amount to more than eight hundred men in the whole. The Duke thereupon caused Faucon to be fecured, and tryed at a Councel of War, where he found more favour, than justice. 'Tis one of the greatest calamities that attend the Generals of Parties poor, and composed of Voluntaries only, that they have no capacity either to reward the Noble, or punish degenerous and unworthy actions.

But to return to the Voyage of Vivaretz: The Duke of Rohan raises four thousand Foot, and about two hundred Horse: But before he began his March thither, diffinantles Saint Geniez, and other small places upon the River Gardon, within the Diocess of Vsez, lest the Romanists, in his absence, should possess themselves of them, and by small Garrisons take off the contribution of all that Country which was full of good Towns; and prejudice the passage from the lower Languedge to the Sevenes: And then engages the aforesaid Provinces in a resolution not to hearken to any particular Treaty, but to communicate all occurrences to him, as on his side, he promised the like, and never to consent to any without the privity of them, all the other Provinces, Rochelle, and the King of England.

When he had taken this courfe, he comes about the beginning of March, with all his Forces to Aletz, where he was follicited (even to a sedition) by the Inhabitants, to employ his Forces in taking in of Vizenobre, and Monts, two Garrisons that incommoded them; but having cleared himself of this importunity, he advanced. His first work was to secure the Castle of Rouffon, lying between Aletz, and Saint Ambroix; and afterwards, in his March, takes in Tharque, and Saint John de Marne fols, two places belonging to the Marquess de Portes, which yielded at fight of his Canon; the latter of these he dismantled, but not the former, being but a small Castle, and the usual residence of the faid Marquels: Having cleared his way as far as Bariac, and being now upon the Confines of V.v. aretz, he thought it necessary to secure a Pass upon the River A deche, for the advantage both of his advance and return. To this end he besieged the Castle of Salvas, fituate on that River, which he blocked up with part of his Fo ces, whiles the other part, under the command of Aubais, passed the River, both for the convenience of quarters, and provisions, as also that at the same time he might block up the Castle of Valon also: The Siege of Salvas lasted five dayes; for that the Canon, and other necessaries, to force it suddenly, were not yet come up; so that they contented themselves with breaking tome of their Out-works, and then had recourse to two Mines which they fprung, and to good effect too; the base Court being taken, the Carrison retreated to the Tower, which was stormed on every side: Those within behaved themselves bravely, killed and wounded many of the Asfailants, and among others, the Colonel Goudin was hure; but the Canon came up, and did fuch execution on them, that they were constrained to yield the next day after the affault.

Their example drew the Tower de Moulins, and the Castle of Valor also to a submission: The Duke caused the two Castles to be razed, preserving only the Tower of Moulins, which of it self was strong, and tenable by a small Garrison. To secure this pass, and clear all the way of Vivaretz, there remained only Ville-neufve de Berg, where the Governour Montreal had gotten together twelve hundred men; but notwithstanding that, the Duke was resolved, had it been possible, to attempt it; that so he might not leave any thorns behinde him: But he wanted Ammunition, having spent his small store at the Siege of Salvas; where the scarcity of provisions, and the nearness of some of his men to their own homes, had much diminished his Forces; and, which was worse, so little care had the Province taken in it, that there was nothing for them about Ville-neufve, so that he was fain to leave his Canon at Gorce, and for conveniency of quarters, to March with all his Troops to Privas, the Countrey having not had the least thought of any thing, but how to retort the blame of their want of Provisions one upon another, so that he had much ado to keep together those Souldiers he had left. The first exploit after his arrival in the Province of Vivaretz was the Siege of Choumerarg, performed by Chevrilles, and the Country Troops, whil'it his own refreshed themselves; it lasted three dayes, and then their Works being all battered, the place was yielded on the second of April.

The Duke of Robin's designs in Vivareiz, were to place a Governour, and to compose all the divisions there; but principally to secure a good pass upon the Rhone, both to draw the Tribute of the River to himself, and to facilitate the March of those Forces which the Duke of Savoy had promifed him: For which end some proposed to him Sujon, others la Voute, others Bajes, and Poulin; the inconvenience of the full was its lituation, being in the higher Vivaretz, and so remote from Privas, that it could not be easily removed from thence; that of the second was, that it was a place belonging to the Duke of Ventadour, and being of it self weak, and not capable to be made good, would diain Privas of all its Ammunition, and confequently draw an affront upon that place, which would ruine his reputation, both with the adverse Party, and his own too: Wherefore he pitches on the latter, and begins with Poufin, which when Brifon gave it up, was dismantled; but, to prevent our re-possessing of it, the enemy had fortified a small Tower in the Castle, and raised a little Triangular Fort upon the Rivers fide; he commanded Aubais by night, to possess himself of that part of the Suburbs which lies towards Lauport; and Leques at the same time to enter the Town: In the mean time he drew his Canon, whereupon the Fort was given up; but chiefly for that Leques had already taken the Tower, and from the advantages of it, and the Castle, played so furiously into the Fort, that none durst stir to show himself in it.

Chevrilles with the Forces of the Province, at the same time besieges and takes Saint Auban, which obstructed the passage from Privas to Pousin; and Malmoiras was commanded M to possess himself of the Town of Bajas, to secure it with Bar-Ricadoes, and feize on all the Boars in the Port, which he happiby efficied: This done, Aubais received command to attempt the two Casties of Bajes, which after their dismantling, had been age in repaired; but upon the approach of the Canon, yielded: Which done, the Dake taking into his confideration the fituation of both places, conceived that of Poulin to be the most convenient, both for the facility of being fortified, and the advantage it had to command the River; thither then he commanded to be brought all the Boats, and fent Legues with twelve hundred men into Daupnine, which brought so great a terrour on them, that many Towns fent him in voluntary contributions of Corn, Meal, and Bread, which was a great relief to his men, whom the avarice, and difaffection of Privas had exposed to great extremities; and, that he might lose no time, sets about the Fortisications, to which the Countrey contributed fo little, that he was fain to make Collections among his own Officers to pay the Souldiers that wrought in them.

The Duke, during his abode here, follicites those of the Religion in Dsuphine to joyn with him; but in vain, the Count of Soissons amusing them with hopes that he would shortly appear himself in the head of them; whereupon he sent the Count some overtures to joyn with him, with four thousand Foot, and three hundred Horse in any part of Dsuphine, he should please to appoint; and that if he would bring but as many, he would engage himself in a short time to make him Master of the greatest part of Dsuphine; but he had no other return than empty words, and complementary thanks, which made him think that the Count had rather make an inglorious peace with those he declared to be his enemies, than engage in an honourable War against them.

Whil's he stayed at Ponsia, he also received intelligence from the Duke of Soubize by Carlineas, that the Fleet designed to bring the Corn to Rochelle, would be there towards the latter end of May; but the other, from which they expected their entire deliverance, not till after the Harvest. Chouvilles, who saw the streights the Duke of Roban's Forces were in for want of provisions, proposes him to an attempt upon Cheilard, a small Fown, belonging to the Duke of Ventadour, and seated upon the Confines of Vellay; It has large Suburbs, and a Cassle, that commands them: All the Inhabitants of this, and the neighbouring places, are of the Religion, and till now had been severely persecuted by their Lord, even in times of peace; in order to the effecting of this design, he demands of him two Regiments, which were granted him: The Town he took with Perments, tardes, and with the two aforesaid Regiments invested a Castle, called La Chezé which is about a Canon-shot distant from Cheilard, and upon the fight of two Faucons that were drawn up to it, was given up; with these Gunnes he begins to play upon the Works of the Castle of Cheilard; but the Picces being not sufficient for Battery, he was fain to send to Prevas for some

During this Siege, the Duke had intelligence from all parts, of the Duke of Moutmorency's arrival in the higher Languedoc, who raifed all the Forces he could to fet upon him in his Marches, or to cut off his patfage by taking Barjac: This newes made him resolves no longer to defer his return; wherefore he writes to Chevrilles, that in case the Castle of Cheilard was not taken by a day, which he prefixed, he should send back the two Regiments; which fo quickned his diligence in the enterprise, that the place was taken within the time limited him: And the Duke having given order for the razing of all the places he had taken, except Poufin; and lest Chevrilles in a firm possession of his Government, sets out from Privas upon Easter day, and encamps that night below Mirabel; and as he was marching thence the next Morning by break of day, Aubais, that led the Van, informed him that the enemy appeared, both Horse and Foot, about Saint Germain, a large Town, indifferently well fortified, and distant about a quarter of a league from Ville-neufve; whence they alfo drew out fresh Souldiers: They were all the forces that Ventadour and Montreall could make in that Countrey, which alarmed not the Duke at all, while he was employed about those small Sieges. They made choice of that place, as the most advantageous for them, the passage being strait, and the Dukes Forces of necessity to pass within a Musquet shot of the Town, the passages to which, were very commodious to lodge Musquetiers in : But the Duke of Montmorency, being half a dayes March short of them, they only made a little skirmish, which made the Duke of Rohan desirous to pursue them, and force the Town, which he might have done, but was happily diffwaded from it, left the Duke of Montmorency with his fresh Forces should surprize him, while he was engaged, which would certainly have happened; for he came to Ville-neufve about two houres after they had gotten over the pass, which was done with very good conduct and order; in this Rencontre there were some slain, and wounded on both fides: After this no enemy appeared; but the Duke when he came to Gorce, took his Canon, which he drew back to Anduze, where he gave his Troops some refreshment, which they very much wanted. Ma Mean

Mean while the Prince of Condé and the Duke of Montmorency joyning their Forces take the field, and march into Foix to attempt Pamiez, a great Town, but of no strength: The ill destiny of Beaufort impelled him to a resolution of defending it; to which end he calls in all his own, and most of the Forces of the Countrey; but, a breach being made, their confusion was too great to give them leave to think of any further refistance; those that were false among them, using all means to augment the others fear: Beaufort seeing this disorder, endeavoured to fave himself by slight, together with Anros, but they were both taken, carried to Thoulouse, and there put to death: The town was pillaged, and all manner of licentious cruelties imaginable from Souldiers under such a Commander, were exercised in it: The taking of this Town much dismayed the whole Countrey, where no place escaped the attempts either of threats, or promifes; but the courage and fidelity of Rouffeliere, whom the Duke of Roban had made Governour of Saverdun, together with his fedulous industry to encourage others preserved the Province; and the Prince marched back, with his Army, into the upper Languedoc: Then was the Duke of Montmorency fain to return to Vivaretz, to the affistance of his Partisans there; and the Duke of Roban was with no less instances sollicited by the higher Languedoc, to the fame purpose.

The Prince his first exploit was the Siege of Realmont, a Town whose situation rendred it very considerable; well stored with Souldiers, and all forts of Provisions, and which might have held out much longer, and very well expected the relief preparing for it: But neither did he begin the fiege, till he had Treated with Maugis who was Governour of it; who, having corrupted the first Conful, the Colonel Chaumette, and his Sergeant Major, and made some shew of opposition for ten or twelve dayes, without any breach made, or confulting with his Captains, or the people, contrary to the Oaths they were mutually engaged in, at the enemies first coming before it, not so much as to make the least mention of surrendring, enters into a Capitulation, signes it, and presents it to the Town; who refuling to approve of it, he lets in the Besiegers at a Port, which was at his own devotion, whiles the rest were every one at their respective posts; so that great was the consusion there, and though by the Capitulation the Defendants ought to have marched off with their armes, yet was that violated, and they difarmed. Sigalon, and Huguet, two of Chaumett's Captains, with some other honest Inhabitants of the place, maintained a Bastien, resolutely declaring to the World, that they had rather dye than than quit their armes, which they carryed off, and with them as much honour due to their bravery, as the others did infamy, merited by their baseness. Great were the miseries of this poor Town, whence Men, and Women stript, and without any other covering than their dischevelled haire, came to Roque-Courbe; where Saint Germier, and I. Espuguet, who had the conduct of the affairs of those of the Reformed Party in those parts, by means of the Correspondents they had in Castres, made use of this Barbarisme to provoke the people to an Insurrection, which had fo prosperous an event, that notwithstanding the opposition of the President Montespieu, of the Advocate General, the Consuls, and their adherents, the Walls were scaled, and the Town without the effusion of any blood taken, and the President, and the Advocate banished thence. Chavagnac at the fame time came very opportunely into the Countrey, fent thither by the Duke of Roban to command in chief there, where he was received, and, even in Castres it felf, with an univerfal

Joy

For besides the delight all Novelties usually bring with them, the present state of affaires required a Governour; otherwise the Prince had carried all the Mountain of Albigeois before him; whereas now the greatest mischief suffered there was the loss of Cauve, which the Marquels of Malauze caused to be delivered up to him, in which place, contrary to his promife, he left a Garison: After this he made an offer at Viane, blocked it up, and raised a battery against it; but seeing that neither his threats nor promifes made any impression on the Besieged, and that the Governour Eseroux, and Assas, whom the Duke of Roban had sene thither with four hundred men, seemed to be such as would give him a smart opposition, he raised his stege; and thence goes to attempt Caftelnau and Brassac, places of no strength, but surpriseable even by unarmed men; Nevertheless the former gave him the trouble to draw down his Canon, where the obstinacy of some, occasioned the loss of forty or fifty good Souldiers, who chose rather to submit to all extremities, than to observe the Orders given them by Chavagnac, to draw of as foon as they faw the Enemies Canon, which they might have easily done: This done, the Prince, not daring any more to look towards Viane, fends Linas to Saint Sever, a place of which he himself was Lord, to perswade the Inhabitants to submit before he drew down his Canon; but seeing how ineffectual all his perswasions proved, he stayes there with them; where, after they had endured many Volleys of Canon shot, themselves made a breach in the Wall, and escaped by night. Thence he goes to a Conserence with the Duke of Rohan. Book IV.

folved on the Siege of Saint Afrique.

But before we pass into the higher Languedoc, it will be expedient that, we speak a word or two of Montauban: This Towns though it was then governed by Confuls, and other Magistrates that were great Enemics to the Reformed Party, had nevertheless great inclinations to joyn with them: This, the Duke of Roban himself at first hindred, being not willing they should declare before he came to them; and when after his return from the voyage of Fulx, he defired them so to do, nothing obstructed it, but their want of a Governour: Whereupon the best part of the Toun casting their evesupon Saint Michel, a younger brother of La Roche Chalais, and of Kin to the Duke of Rohan, who applauded their choice, they received him into their Town about May, and there, after that de Birgues, and Saint Foy, through many difficulties, and great dangers, had conducted thither, from the lower Guienne, fourfcore, or an hundred Horse, and Viant a Company of Foot, and that he had all his necessary Provisions ready, on the four and twentieth day of Fine, they put him in possession of his Command. The first thing he did, was to order all things in a Militiary way; raising a Regiment composed of Voluntiers, such as had Asyled themselves there; and incolling also in the establishment, those Horse that de Bargues had brought thither.

But before he could well fettle himfelf in his authority he mer with many rubbs, having for enemies, not only those that were of a contrary Party, but, even among his own, many rivals for the place, who under-hand did him many ill Offices: Some of these he surmounted by prudence and dissimulation; and to others he was fain to apply open force, and the extremity of rigor; The most eminent example of which, was occasioned by three young Souldiers, Natives of the Town, whose names were Cartie, La Foest, and Brete, who disgusted at a denial of some Offices they fued for g or elfe fet on by some others, envious of his honour, entred into a conspiracy against his person, and to compass their design make a Party in the Town, to which they drew in many Giddy braines, and among them some of quality, as the sonnes of the Advocate Clerk, and the Counsellour de la Rose, which gave greater suspitions that this business was fomented by other persons, who, though they appeared not at all in it, yet were they the principal Agents. The pretence of this conjuration was the publique liberty, by which means having raifed many of the people, they they themselves in the head of them, with their Swords and Pistols in their hands, and in that equiequipage march to the Governours quarters, crying out Liberty, Liberty! and that it was high time to rid themselves of those that oppressed it: When they came near to his door, they were stopped by some of his guard, who so gallantly behaved themfelves in the defence of it, that they killed five or fix of the Mutiniers, and among others Clerk, and La Rosse: The tumule spreading it self in the Town, the Consuls, with a great number of the Inhabitants, haste down to the Governours; to whom when Saint Michel had recounted the Action, and justified the procedure of his Souldiers, all were well fatisfied; and the Confuls causing the said Cartie, La Forest, and Brete, Authours of the sedition to be apprehended, they were tryed, and condemned by the Council of Warre, which in favour of their relations in the Town, instead of hanging, caused them to be shot to death. Saint Michel, whom this example of Justice had now fixed in his authority, thinks of enlarging his quarters; and conceiving himfelf strong enough in Souldiers, by reason of those that were fled thither for shelter, he undertook to put the Town of Cnasade in a posture of defence; and having put Chastillon a Gentleman of Angoulmois with eight hundred good men into it, he used fuch diligence in his fortifications, that in a very short space the place was made tenable; This the Prince, and the Duke d' Espiram had intended to besiege, but were diverted by the Siege of Crefeil, which drew away the Prince with his Forces, so that the Dake d' Espernon was unwilling to engage alone in the Siege, but endeavoured to contrive some intelligences, and correspondencies within, that might help him to surprize it, in which even the Minister of that Church, whose name was Le Grand, who had deferted it in the very beginning of the troubles, was his great Affistant, informing him of the condition of the Town, and perswading him, as much as in him lay, to attempt it; but finding his defign not feifible that way, he contented himself only with an assault, which he caused to be made on the out-works, where he was so generously received, that, leaving many dead upon the place, and some Garisons in the adjacent Towns, he drew away again.

But return we now to the Duke of Rohan, who, from the beginning of the Siege of Realmont, was extreamly importuned to relieve it, for which he was diligently preparing himself; but after it was taken, he was as earnestly sollicited to march towards the higher Languedoc, so that there passed not a week in which he received not two or three dispatches, to that effect: On the other fide he found he should have much ado to gaine his Souldiers diers consent to it; for that their late sufferings in Vivaretz gave them cause to sear they should meet with no better entertainment in this Voyage; so that to allure them to it, he resolves on a design upon Mirveis, a place upon the Borders of Rouergue, strong, and of great concernment to the Sevences, where he knew all the Countrey would come in to him; assuring himfelf withal, that, whatever his success should be in the attempt, having by this means drawn his men half way, he should with more facility perswade them to adventure on the rest.

Wherefore he fends for le Fesque, who first moved this defign to him, and perswaded him, that in taking the Town, he should also surprize the Captain of the Castle, and at one stroke carry both: He gave him Orders to take as many Souldiers as he thought helfhould have occasion for; but at the time appointed for the execution of it, so violent and rempessuous was the weather upon the Mountain de l' Espernon, the place of Rendez-vous, that many of the Souldiers (though it was then Summer) died of the cold; so that they were faine roput it off till another time; which gave the enemy some jealousie of their intentions, and those in the Castle leasure to furnish themselves with many necessaries, and especially to recruit their garisons with Souldiers: Notwithstanding all which Le Fesque returnes thither again within two dayes, and fixing four Petardes to it, carried the Town: But, instead of presently investing the Cafile, and securing the Corn for the nourishment of the Army, every one fell a pillaging, and in the mean time the Chevalier Chambour, with fifty menigot into it.

The Duke of Roban in the mean time expecting the iffue of this design at Nismes, gave Orders for the raising of the Militia of the Sevence, and principally of the two Regiments of Valefoure, and La Roque, and sent away those of Lassaye, and Brenoux, commanding them by several wayes to march towards Mirveis, and, upon the first notice of the taking of the Town, to invest the Castle, and draw thither the small Canon that was at Vigan: He sent away also Goudin's Regiment to Barjac, which the Duke of Montmorency hovered about, as if he had some design upon it; with Orders also, in case necessity so required, to march into Vivaretz.

This done, he receives advice of the taking of Mirveis, and the disorders there committed: Whereupon he departs from Nisms, and steering his course thitherward, sent Leques post before him to compose and order all things there, When he came to Vigan, he met with a dispatch from the higher Langue.

doc, pressing him more instantly than ever to hasten thither, otherwise the whole Countrey was in danger to be lost; where-upon he sent away Aubais with the Regiments of Sandres, Fourniquet, and Bimart, and three Troops of Horse: When Leques came to Mirveis; conceiving, that that Castle was not to be forced by so mean a Train of Artillery as they had there, he commands the Canon to be drawn to Nujolls, to secure a Castle standing upon a pass of great importance, which upon the approach of it prefently yielded.

After this, comes the Duke himself to Mirveis, and being of opinion with Leques that there was no taking of the Castle without a bigger piece of battery: Those that were at Millaud were proposed, as the nearest and most easie to be drawn this ther: Thither then he goes with a sufficient Convoy for them, but found it absolutely impossible to bring them; wherefore he commands Leques, by a Letter, to fend with all speed to Anduze for the Culverin of Nismes; And in the interim determines to go himself to Saint Afrique, upon report of the Siege of Viane, which the Prince pretended to attempt; but as he was ready to set out, he received a Letter from Leques, which informed him, that upon a bruit spread among the Troops at Mirveis that he was going towards Castres, and that there was a great relief preparing for the Castle, very many of the Souldiers had left their Colours, that the Inhabitants of the Town had fent away their goods, and that unless his sudden return thither prevented it, he would finde the Siege totally abandoned: This made him face about with all speed; and finding that the Letter he had written to Leques was fallen into the enemies hands, he sent another to Anduze for the great Culverin; and resolved now to see what would be the event of this Siege: In order to which he plants his Canon, and with them batters the Outworks that he might the more easily (in case there should be occasion for it) come to mining; and as he was giving Orders to storm the Castle-works the night following, there came Newes that there was a very confiderable Body forming for the relief of Mirveis; that all Largae and Rouergue flocked in to them; that there were twelve hundred drawn out of the Garison of Montpellier, and that from Beziers and Gignac, were fent many Souldiers also; and that their Rendez-vous was to be at Veiros, two Leagues distant from Mirveis: In effect the thing was very true, and moreover the Baron Puzols, who commanded the Duke of Montmorency's Life Guard, was already come thither with three hundred Horse, to undertake the charge of the whole relief which confifted of about two thousand Foot: This made made the Duke defer the storming of the Castle, that he might provide to repel these succours; to which end he spent all that night in cutting a Trench across the hill, the only way they had to relieve the Castle, and caused his Canon to be drawn into a Redout; the next morning, the Majors General Leques and Boiffiere, visit all the quarters, cause the Redout, and Trenches to be well-manned, and Ammunition to be delivered out to the Souldiers, and also give all necessary instructions to the Colonels; the Duke of Rohan himself stayes in the Parade place with Montredon, the Voluntiers, two Troops of horse-men, whom he had commanded to alight, his own Guards, and La Baume, with two hundred of his own Regiment, that he might be ready upon all occasions, to send relief to those that should need it; about Noon the Scoutes give notice of the Romanists approach, and fuddenly every one betakes him to his Post, when presently after they shew themselves upon thetop of a hill, whence they sent down five hundred men in two divisions, which advanced boldly, and in good order up to our very Canon, which gave them a very harsh salute; besides which, they saw the Trenches well stored with men, and on the right, and left hand, Regiments marching up the Hill to environ them; this put them upon as sudden and nimble a retreat; being followed with Vollies of Musquet shot, up to the top of the Hill, where presently all disappeared, and by the diforder was to be feen among them, might be rather conjectured to flie, than to retreat: The next day every one took his own way, and the Duke returned to the intended affault; battering, the night following, the Pallifadoes of the Counterscarfe, all which were broken down; and then drew up to the very Graffe, from whence he beat the Defendants off their Works; who as he was approaching to the Wall, beat a parley, which they obtained, together with very honourable conditions. This Siege lasted three weeks; and when the Castle was delivered, there marched out one hundred and thirty Souldiers, that wanted neither Ammunion, nor provision.

When the Prince had notice of the reddition of Mirveis, and that the fifteen Companies drawn out of Montpellier, were upon their March to joyn with him, he resolved with the Duke of Spernon, upon the Siege of Saint Afrique; which when the Duke of Rohan was informed of, he would have gone to Millaud; but the next day, after the reddition of Mirveis, finding that he had no more than eight hundred men left, the rest being gone to refresh themselves, he was forced to go to Vigan; after he had gotten an engagement from them; that within ten days they should be all ready at any Rendezvous he should appoint them.

Book IV. The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. 171 them, to go to the relief of Saint Afrique; he fent dispatches also to Nimes, and Viez, from whence he received a very good recruit.

In this interval, the Duke of Rohan had notice of what became of the second Fleet, which was dispatched from England, to supply Rochelle with provisions, untill the greater, designed for its entire deliverance, could be made ready. The ftory is this, The Duke of Soubize, seconded by the Deputies, and Merchants of Rochelle that were then in England, urges the King with such earnest and assiduous importunities, that he resolved upon the victualling of Rochelle; for which, when all things were in a readiness, the Duke of Buckingham offered him the command of the Fleet; but understanding that there were but five men of War defigned for their Convoy, and perceiving by so slender a provision of ships of war, that he intended to draw an affront, together with the whole blame of the Rochellers upon him, he refuses to accept it, but declared withall, that, if he would go in person, he would be ready to accompany him; Upon this his refusal, the Duke of Buckingham re-inforces the Fleet with five great ships more, and many other men of War; and being railed to the number of seventy in allson the 17th. day of May, he sent them orders to hoise Sail, which they did under the command of his brother-in-Law, the Earle of Dinbigh; foon as the enemy descryed them, they weigh Anchor, as if they intended to advance, and fight them; but on the sudden tacked about again towards the same place from whence they came. Bragneau took a French Pinnice at Sablenceau, where the Earle cast Anchor so near the Shore, that he thence received a Canon-shot into his own ship, which made him weigh Anchor again, and with the whole Navy remove to ride at a greater distance from the enemies Canon. Many dayes were spent in debates, and refolutions never executed; fo that some Merchants, that were there, urged him to attempt either to fight, or pass by them; but his Captains stiffely maintained that it could not be done, without exposing the English Forces to too great a hazard; only the Vice-admiral, and one Captain Carre, shewed more forwardnels, and loudly exclaimed against the flackness of all the rest: Whereupon the French that were then in the Fleet, to the number of two or three and twenty ships, and Barques drew up together, and seeing the backwardness of the others to resolve on any thing, come in a Body to the Earle of Denbigh, and prefent him a Petition figned by them all, by which they befeeched him to grant them four Merchant-men fitted for a fight, three fireships, and Souldiers to guard those ships that carried the provisions, obliging themselves with that equipage to get into the town, and promifing moreover, both in their own, and the names of the Rochellers, that in case any of those ships miscarried in the adventure, they should be payed for, according to a just estimation of their value. But to all this they received no answer, but evasions, and denials; whereupon the French sent Gobert, to the King of great Britain, with their complaints, and withall, to discover to him the facility of the passage, and the offers they had made: Mean while the Captain Videau takes a small Boat, and in it passes the Bay by night, carrying to the besieged a letter from Bragaeau, which advised them not to rely any longer on hopes of relief from the English, who, at the same time, without any further attempt made, weighed Anchor, steering their course home-wards: When they came to the Isle of Wight, they cast Anchor there, and thence sent their Apologies into England before them, grounded upon the impossibility of the enterprise, and the tenour of their Commission, whose most substantial words, and which imported a permission to fight, they pretended were interlined, although it was with the Kings own hand.

These excuses were easily admitted by the Duke, and those of his Gang, though others deduced from them but sad consequences for the Rochellers, that poor and miserable people, that with fuch transports of joy beheld the arrival of the Fleet, with no less astonishment saw it lie idle for eight dayes entire, and then leave them in a greater dejection than before; and yet having received so many promises, and assurances of relief, could they not give credit to their Admirals Letter, but prepare a new dispatch to the King of England; who upon the newes of the Fleets return, affembles his Council, and resolves to send back Gobert to the Earle of Denbigh with new O ders to return again to the Rode of Roshelle, and there to expect a Renfort. About which time also came Bragaeau with newes of the Fleets return, and two dayes after Clarke, who was sent to be of the Earles Councel, and Agent for the King in Rochelle, who when he had given in his relation of the affair, had his own house for his prison: But to hasten away this new relief for the distressed Rochellers, Orders were given to Captain Manners, & Captain Pennington, to expedite the building of ten great ships, of fifteen hundred, or two thoufand Tun-burthen, made purposely to fight near the shore, not drawing more than seven or eight foot-water, and carrying two and twenty Guns a piece: The Duke of Buckingham, who defired not that any one should pry too narrowly into the projects he had against Rochellesremoved from the Court a Secretary that was very zealous for its deliverance, causing him to be sent to Portsmouth to prepare other Vessels, and buy Provisions, and Ammunition there, where he stayed till the departure of the Fleet.

But let us now see what passed at the Siege of Saint Afrique, a small Town, lying between two hills that command it, so that nothing can be done within, that may not from thence be discovered; neither did any till this time, ever think of fortifying it: But yet the importance of the place for preserving the Communication between the higher, and the lower Languedoc obliged us to break the ground, which is there very maniable: But never did that Town expect the honour of an affault from the first Prince of the blood: The River Sorgue runs under the walls of it, and divides it from that part of the Suburbs, that lies towards Vabre, which of necessity was to be fortified also, it being easie for the enemy to make his approaches that way, and for that the River beating against the Walls, would not give way to any nearer fortifications on that fide: The whole fortification of this Suburbs was composed of Spurs, and little Flanquers, whose Trenches were four fathom wide, and the Paraget Canon-proof, behind it was nothing but a small bank instead of a Rampart; all that gave us hopes to be able to defend it, was, that there was room enough for us to intrench our felves behind it; besides, so strangely odde was the situation of that place, that without a great Army, there was no hindering of relief from coming to it, both from Milland,

Saint Rome, Tara, and the Bridge of Cauvers.

Aubais, who was advanced as far as the faid Bridge, that he might have an eye upon Viane, when he saw the Army bind its course towards Rowergue, divided his Forces into two parts, referving the stronger to himself, and sending the other to Saint Afrique, which the Prince came before on the eight and twentieth day of May; and having viewed it, conceived it intenable, and at that instant condemned it to the fire, and all manner of extremities; nor yet indeed was it to be defended, but by a great number of men: Aubais very handsomly did his devoir, sending them from his quarters, as many men, and as much powder as they defired: La Baune, whom the Duke of Roban had left with his Regiment at Millaud, for the same purpose did the like; so that in the very height of the Siege, there was no want of any thing; but there happening a difference between Vacaresse, and Bimart, Saint Estienne, and Sandres were fain to interpose, and reconcile them, who afterwards did very good fervice in the storm. The approaches, batteries, and breaches, being all made within the space of eight or ten dayes, the Prince commands his men to make ready for the affault, and those within also prepare to give him a brave reception; who, though they had very good Works and Trenches, would not yet lose one inch of ground: There were within the Town, besides the Foor

Foot, the Baron d' Aletz, and Saint Estrenne's Troops of horse; the best armed among them were placed at the Breaches, and all the other posts were well manned also: The whole Garrison consisted of sifteen hundred sighting men; the storm lasted sive houres, was thrice renewed, and during it, one Culverin discharged about sixty shot upon one of the Breaches, which carried off some legs, and armes; but could not save the Assainants from a repulse, who left sour hundred dead upon the place, among which were La Passe, and La Magdaine, two Captains, and fourty other Officers, not comprising those that were wounded; of the Desendants there were slain about eight and twenty, and threescore hurt.

The morrowafter the affault was made, came both from Millaud, and the Bridge de Cauvers, four hundred men more to Saint Afrique: The news of this quickly flew to the Duke of Rohan, at Mirveis, where he had three thousand Foot, and made what hast he could thither; having given order that Chavignae, with the Forces of Albigeois, should joyn with Aubais, and fall upon the enemy on one side, while he did the like on the other; and the befieged, at the fame time, were to make a fally upon their Canon: But that which he feared, came to pass, to wit, the Prince his raising the Siege: Then had the Duke a fair opportunity to purfue him, and then thought of no. thing that would prevent it: But the affairs of Castres summoned him thither, where Saint Germier, induced to it, by those that were disaffected to the Reformed party, opposed Chavagnac in his command: Those of Foix required his presence, to remedy the disorders fallen out there since the death of Beaufort; the Town of Villaude would by all means that he should fit down before Creffeil, and fent Deputies purposely to sollicite him to to that effect; and on the other fide, the Siege of Saint Afrique being now over, no body would stir a foot further; all alledge ing the necessity of their return, to look after their Harvests, efpecially those of Nismes, and Viez, whose fields were threatned to be ravaged; and besides these, there were in the Army many Citizens, and Merchants, too delicate, long to endure the hard-Thip of an Army: Vivaretz also cryed out for help, the Duke of Montmorency being fallen into that Province, with a strong power: Lyonnois also with Dauphine, Vivaretz, and the lower Languedoc, importuned him to free the Rhote; on which the Duke had already befreged Poufin, and battered Mirabel.

Amidst these urgent sollicitations on all hands, the Duke, it being impossible for him to divide himself amongst them all, returns to the lower Languedoc; sends Aubais to Castres, to com-

Book IV. The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. 173 pose the divisions there, and designs Saint Estienze with his Troop for Foix; whiles he with the rest of his Forces, to divert the Duke of Montmorchey from Vivaretz, goes to Vezenobre, which by a long March he sufprized, so dissurnished of men, that having with one Petard, taken the Town, the night sollowing he raised his Battery, and the next morning began to play upon the Castle, which he took by assault; but gave quarter to all in it.

This Siege wrought the wished effect; for the Duke of Minimorency, after he had taken Mirabel, instead of continuing his progress in Vivaretz, marched off to relief Vezenobre, which he thought would have held out much longer; but finding the business already over, he drew off to Beaucaire; and the Duke of Roban, when he had given order for fighting of Vezenobre, dismissed his Voluntiers, put his other Regiments into Garrisons, and goes himself to Nismes, to put them in a posture to prevent the spoil the Dake of Montmorency had command to make there; but had written to the Court, that he could not undertake it with less than fix thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse; for which care was taken, and he supplied with three Regiments from Dauphine, and some Horse drawen out of the Army, the Marquels of Vxelles was then conducting to the relief of Cagal: These preparations made Nimes, and Vsez look about them, and promise good quarters to all the Horse and Foot should come in to their affishance: The Duke of Roham writ to those of the Sevenes, to this effect; but they came not so soon as they promised; nor did those of Nismes gratifie them as they ought; Nevertheless he goes to see what might be done, and promifes to preserve all their Corn, within a League of their Town, to wit, that which lies upon the Vistre (which is the richest land about Nismes) a small, but dangerous River; all whose passes he spoyles, and in all places of danger caused good Redoubts to be built; but as for the rest of their Fields, there was no possibility of preserving them: And yet, had the Peasants observed what was commanded them, which was, to leave their Sheaves scattered upon the ground, they had saved a great part of them; which being made up in flacks, and the enemy coming to forrage at the time they usually thresh out their Corn, (which is there done in the Fields) they were all eafily confumed.

The Duke of Montmorency takes up his first quarters at Saint Margueriete, a good league from Ni/mes; and the next day leaving it on his left hand, came and lodged at Chaumette, and Saint Genies, three leagues distant from Ni/mes, and as faire from Viex: Thence passes through the Towns upon

176 The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book IV the Gardon, and so gets into Vauvage, and took up his last quarters at Bernis and Vehas.

In this march, which lasted six or seven dayes, he burnt much Corn, and also many Villages; which done, he retires to Beaucaire (having not at all entred into the Territories of Nismes) and the Troops of Dauphine returned to joyn with the Marquess of Uxelles, all the Voluntiers went home; the forces of the lower Languedoc were sent into Garisons, and the Duke of Montmorency himself went to Bezieres and Pezenas.

About this time came a Gentleman from the King of England to the Duke, which dispatch was occasioned by an apprehension given him, that since the return of the second Fleet, there were two Deputies with the Duke of Rohan, in order to a Treaty for peace; to divert which, he was commanded to tell him, that shough that Fleet after an ineffectual Voyage were returned, yet there was now so strong a one prepared, and ready to set Saile, that he was confident it would be the entire deliverance of Rochelle; and that though God should not favour him in that atrempt, yet would he never forfake the rest of the Reformed Party; Nay, although there should be no more left than the very person of the Dake, he affured him he would hazard all that he was Master of, for the preservation of that alone; desiring further to know of him what hopes he had of affiftance from Italy and Spaine, that in case the King should press him too hard, he might be directed by him how to affift him, either by a diversion or otherwise: David, one of the Deputies of Rochelle was present at the delivery of this Message: To which the Duke replied, that he was so far from any thoughts of a Treaty, that he had again caused the Oath of Union to be renewed, to this effect, that none should hearken to any peace, but conjoyntly with him; and that he had already made known to him; the means he had to affift him-

This done, the Duke seeing the Duke of Monmorency's Troops lay scattered and dispersed in several parts, takes his turn also, and burntall the Corn, and Countrey Houses belonging to the Inhabitants of Bemacaire, within Musquet shot of their very walls: And when he thought to make another inrode into the Marish-Countrey for Salt, he met, in a narrow place upon the Rhone, nearer home, two Barques convoyed by a Frigote, and laden with four and twenty thousand French Bushels, so that commanding some of his Souldiers to swim to the other side for a Boat, he transported many of his Foot to Camargues, that he might on both sides attaque the Frigote; but she soon forfook her Merchandize, which was as quickly carried away: Bessides fides this booty, they drove much Cattle from Camargues, and did much spoyle there also by fire. When the Duke of Montmorency heard of these excursions, he made haste to rally his forces, appointing them their Rendez-vous at Lunel. The Duke, in this expedition, going, and returning, marched above fourteen long Leagues, without making any long stay in any place; and got home again before any of the enemy could be gotten together; And happy was it for him; for he was but in an ill condition to sight; every Souldier being so laden with pillage, that he could never get any more to march in order, than three hundred souldiers, of la Baume's Regiment, which brought up the Rear.

When this expedition was over, the Duke was in great perplexities, not knowing how to dispose of his Forces, especially his Horse: For he could now raise no more contribution for their maintenance, by reason that the Villages were all burnt? And the Sevenes was no Countrey for Horse: If he should go towards Castres, there was the Prince with his Army in the higher Languedoc, who had particular Orders to impede his passage; and the Duke of Montmorency had also a strict Command, with his Forces to follow him, whither ever he should go: For it was feared less the should go to Montauban, and raise those of the Religion in Guienne in favour of the English, whose coming they seared: If he went into Roilergue to no other end but to eat them up, it would not be long ere their cryes would be heard; so that necessity now obliged him to undertake the siege of Creseil.

But before we go thither, it will not be amiss to say something of Aubais his return to Castres; who though he made but a seeming accommodation between Saint Germier and Chavagnac, the cause of the misunderstanding still remaining, and something their conceived rancour one against the other, so that the pretended reconciliation lasted not long; nevertheless his being there was to great purpose to oppose those that came to forrage and plunder those parts, where his brother Saint Estimate was unhappily slain, by their own Canon, which being not well spunged, as they were re-charging it, the Powder took fire, and killed him: He was a Gentleman of great courage, and zeal for his party, and was the next day to have gone into Foix, where they stood in great need of him.

The Marquels of Ragay, who commanded the Prince his Army, and had much ravaged the Countrey, goes, for his last exploit, to burn Mazamet, and to besiege Hautpout, whither Dapuy, a gallant Souldier, with the Inhabitants of Mazamet,

N we were retired; but having, to no purpose, lain before it for the space of twelve dayes, he drew off to Brugiere, where he dyed.

And here it will be expedient to insert a word or two concerning Glausel, who coming from Piedmont, made the Duke of Rohan some propositions of assistance from Spaine; which, if demanded, he was consident he might have freely, and in a large measure; for that having conferred about it with the Span sh Embassadour in Piedmont, he had given him very good holes of it; telling him moreover, that it was the Interest of Spaine, to endeavour a prolongation of the Civil Wars in France; that they might with more case compass their designs in Italy; that the Abbot Scaglia, the Dake of Savoy's Embassadour, was now in Spaine, and would contribute his numost power to assist him in it; having already in England, and elsewhere, declared himself a great favourer of the Resonned Party, out of his implacable hatred to those that govern now in France.

The great exigencies the Duke was in for want of money, the Countrey being unable, and the Towns unwilling to furnish him any more; neither could be expect any from England; nor had he received any thing from the Duke of Savoy, but empty promises, enforced him to seek out some way or other to supply his wants; and in effect he faw none but this; which yet he durst not pitch upon, without the King of England's leave, fearing left it might give him an offence, and consequently an occasion to desert him: Notwithstanding this doubt, yet would he not reject Clausel's proposals; but deferres his dispatch, till he could give notice of it to the King of England, and to his Embassadour then in Piedmont; from both whom he received very favourable answers; and then sent Clausel into Spaine; Injoyning him to declare to the King of Spaine, that if the continuance of the War in France might be serviceable to his defignes, upon condition he would afford those of the Religion a speedy and round supply of money, he would engage himself to protectie, as long as it should be agreed upon between them; but that otherwise he should be constrained to make his peace; that he should have the whole Winter to provide it, and that he would expect his answer till the next March: And forasmuch as that, immediately after the departure of Clanfel, there came news of the loss of Rochelle; he sent two Messengers after him to let him know, that that accident had not any thing shaken his resolutions; but that he continued constant to his former proposals, Clausel passes through Foix into Spaine, where he was very well received, and heard; and had very advantageous Propositions made him also; All which good news he imparts to the Duke of Rohaa; giving him good hopes of a prompt, and powerful assistance: At length having concluded the Treaty, he goes into Picamont, to facilitate and expedite the execution of all things; and as he went, landed a Gentleman belonging to the King of Spain, who was to have bought the Duke a Copy of the Agreement; But he suffered himself to be taken at the Gates of Lunct, when he had but half a League more to go beyond all danger, of which aban advertised Clausel, who when he came to Picamont, gave the English Embassiadour an account of all his negotiation.

Return we now to Crescil, a place about a Canon shor distant from Millaud, having a treble inclosure of Walls, one whereof environs the Town, and the two others the Castle, which must be forced one after another, for that there is no coming at the Castle, but through the Town; the farthest part of it being built upon a Rock of a vast height: It is true, the Walls that inclose the Town are not worth any thing, being ruinous, and full of breaches, fo that it were a shame to lie eight dayes before it, and not to take it: But he that has to deale with a people, to whom no defign feems difficult, and when they come to put it in execution, make no provision of necessaries to effect it, will want no incumbrances: Rohan gives notice of his intentions to Alteyrac and Gueria, that without any noise, they might put all things in a readiness to effect them; and gave Alterrac also Orders to block up the place, a day before he came with his Troops; that so he might surprize it at a greater advantage, when meanly furnished with Souldiers; which he did, but yet all their diligence could not prevent the entry of supplies into it.

When the Troops were all come up, the Siege was formed, and a battery of two Guns raised, which had not discharged six shot, before the Carriage of one of them flew all to pieces; and when that was mended, the like accidenc befell the other; for that the whole time, almost, was spent in repairing the Carriages of the Guns; and with such untoward Timber, that when all was done, they did but little better than before; so that the breach being not made large enough in one day, they were fain to remit the profecution of their battery till the morrow, which gave the befreged leafure to repaire, and make it better than before: Nevertheless urged by the shortness of his time the Duke commanded an assault to be made, in which he was repulsed. In the mean while the Duke of Montmorency, who with his Army, had still waited on the motions of Rohan, joynes with Na with the Prince; and having diffwaded him from his intended attempt upon Caufade, and gotten together all the Forces of that Countrey, came with eight thousand Foot, and fix hundred Horse to lie at Saint Geo ges, distant but a league from Creseit; of which, when the Duke of Roban had intelligence, that very night he drew off his Canon, and the next day, having lest Creseit again at liberty, drew up his whole Army in Battailla near Millaud; where about noon, the Prince appeared with his whole Army, which, when Montmorency had recruited the Garrison with men, and all other necessaries, marched off to their

This Siege did at least this good, that it preserved Causade, which was not yet in a condition to withstand to great a power: The night following Roban fends his Foot into Saint Rome! upon Tarn, and into Saint Afrique; and seeing that both Armies were fo near him, he thought with his Cavalry, having no baggage to incumber them, he might reach Castres in one night: This he proposed to his Officers, who were of opinion, that it would be convenient to stay one day longers to observe the countenance of the enemy, which totally frustrated his intentions of passing that way; for as he was about to attempt it the next day, he found that Montmorency had prevented him, and waited for him on the way both with Horse and Foot; which made him instantly resolve to take with him all his Forces, and by great Marches got into the higher Languedoc, to befiege Aimargues, which he was confident (in case he found but the ordinary Garrison in it) a few dayes would make him Master of; It is a Town of an indifferent bigness, distant about sour leagues from Nismes, and one from Lunel, seated in the best part of that Countrey, and upon a Flat, no wayes to be commanded, the mold also being soft, and tractable; and in short, accommodated with all things necessary to make it a very brave place; it is also inclosed with fair Free-stone Walls, flanked with small Towers, and a large and deep Trench, full of water, on the outfide of which were two or three half Moons, little, and ill made. To this end he fent Aubais to Ni/mes, to get the Canon in a readiness, and that he might the better conceal his defign, divides his Forces, and marches thither two feveral ways; he himself, with that party which he conducted, came thither first, and presently invests the place; the next day arrived the others also, and then he assigned every one their post, and entirely blocked it up: And without further delay fent to Nifmes, to hasten away the Canon, which came also in good time: The night following, he plants them upon the Battery he hadraifed,

and the next day, without the loss of one man, made a fair breach; and having made provision of ladders, for that the Walls, being but low in many places, are easily scalable, and the Trench in many parts passeable, he disposed his men for a general assault: When the Governour, the Marquess of Saint Sulpice, a younger brother of the house of Vsex saw these preparations, conceiving he had not men enough to defend himfelf against the storm, he demands a parley; the Duke of Roban fent him word, that he was much troubled that a young Gentleman of his quality should be so unfortunately engaged in a place where from his first Essay he could derive nothing but disadvantage and dishonour: Nevertheless out of regard to the amity between their houses, he offered him as honourable conditions, as he himfelt could have defired, which he accepted, and within an houre after marched out with his Garrison.

The Dake of Montmorency, while he was yet at la Caune, at the same instant received intelligence, both of the Seige, and taking of this place, and upon the re-iterated importunities made him, presently repaired thither to settle the Province, which the so sudden taking of Aimsigues had much disordered. The Duke of Rohan mean while employes that little leasure he had in clearing the Countrey of those Paltry Forts, and Towns, which lay about Nismes, and Vsez; as the Castle of Vauvert, Mainne, Sargnac, Saint Bonnet, Refmolins, Ves, and Chastillon, which yeilded upon the approach of his Canon: All which he demolished, except Resmolins, which he was desirous to keep for that it might be useful to him when he should have occasion to look towards Ville-neufue by Avignon: But the conservation of Aimargues, and the Fortifications he had there begun, made him relinquish all other designs for the present, to apply himself wholly to that.

Whiles he was thus occupied, survenes the Dake of Montmorency, threatning to befiege Aimargues, and preparing his Canon, and all other necessaries for it; which obliged the Duke of Robin to draw towards it, and clap in twelve hundred Foot, where he defigned also a Counterscarfe, Curtains, and half Moons, to be made for the security of those places which were weakest, and most liable to danger; and having summoned in the Militia of the Sevenes, he put ax or feven hundred of them into the great Galargues, whither he caused ammunition-bread to be fent them daily from Nifmes, commanding them to defend it against a party, but not to stay till the enemy drew down their Canon. Some weeks passed they in this posture; in the mean time the Dake of Montmorency despairing to do any good upon

Aimargues, turns his design upon the Forces in Galargues; appoints his Rendez-vous by break of day at the Bridge of Lunel, and that morning goes thence to invest them. The two that commanded there, were Vale cure, and la Roque, both gallant Gentlemen, the former very stiffely perfists in a resolution to see their Canon, thinking by night, to draw off into Vauvage, a good Countrey for the Foot, and where all the Inhabitants were of the Religion; but this was contrary to the express order of the Duke of Rohan; who understanding that they were besieged, with all speed rallies his Troops, and comes to relieve them: The Dake of Montmorency on the other fide, draws all the Garrison' out of Montpell er; the Regiment of Normandy also, with several others, come to joyne with him. His Army with his Canon, he tanged in Battailla, in a place of great advantage: Rohan goin! to view him, that he might know whether he should attempt this relief by day, or in the night-time, findes him to be for the fland Foot, and four hundred good Horse strong, and fo acvantageously lodged that there was no coming at him in any good order, nor without passing within Pistol-shot of a dangerous Valley; which made him not discover his Troops, and defer advancing with the relief till the night following: He incamps about half a league from the place, in a Valley near a Wood, leaving a Troop of Horse to observe the motions of Montmorency, and to hinder the discovery of his own Forces: About the close of the evening comes a Meffenger from the befieged, to demand fome affistance, whom he fent back again with another with him, to tell them, that when they should hear the Alarme on the other fide, they should be ready to fally out at such a place as they should direct them; that they should finde five hundred selected men to receive them within Musquet-shot of Galargues; and that he, with the rest of his Army, would be within a quarter of a league ready to bring them off; that if they knew any better way to fave themselves, they should acquaint him with it, and care should be taken of them; but, if they approved of this course, that they should make three fires upon the top of the Tower, that it might be accordingly followed. The Messengers got very well in, and the besieged also approve of the design; In witness whereof they give the fignal of the three Fires, and prepare themselves for the Sally: The Duke of Rohan sent the five hundred men he had promised within two Musquet-shor, caused the Alarme to be given thrice, and yet no body stirred in Galargues, but all stayed till day; which being now pretty well advanced, he drew off his five hundred men, who by a Volley of thot at their departure, let them know how near they had come to fetch them off: The Duke understood afterwards, that some of the Captains, who had bad legs, or lame courages, hindred their coming forth; whose fears flattering them with false and deceitful hopes, made them choose rather to submit to their enemies. than run the hazard of marching three or foure hundred paces with feven hundred men, with their Swords in their hands, which when they had done, they were fure to be received by five hundred more, and a quarter of a league farther by two thousand. In great choler, and with an extream regret did the Duke draw off again, the next day, knowing they had yielded themselves to be disposed of at the discretion of their Conquerours, if they procured not the surrender of Aima gues; which if they effected, then were they all to be fet at liberty, and have their baggage restored to them: Valescure, and Baviere, were chosen Deputies, and fent with this goodly message to the Duke of Roban, who made them both prisoners; but Valescure escapes, and gets into the Seven's, to incite the Communalties there to an insurrection, in case Aimarques were not given up again; others also went thither privately from Montpellier to the same end; Roban fearing some commotions in that Province, goes thither too himfelf, and takes with him the Deputies of Nifmes and Viez, afsembles both the Provinces at Anduze, where he brought them to this resolution, that Aimargues should not be re-delivered, and that all those prisoners they already had, or for the future should take, should be treated with the same rigour as was used to those of Galargues; and that he might have his revenge, he fits down before Monts, with but two thousand men at most; five dayes did he lie before it, for that the incessiont rain that fell, retarded the arrival of their great Canon from Anduze, for the space of three whole dayes together: But though the bad weather mischieved him on that side, it abundantly recompensed that Injury on another, swelling the two Gardons, so that four or five Regiments, which could they have come the direct way, had reached him in one dayes march, not able to pass the Rivers any other way, than by a Bridge, were fain to make four or five dayes of it; and he to prolong their journey, causes all the Boats, and Ferry-boats upon the Rivers to be broken, and a strong Guard to be kept at Saint Nicholas Porte; so that immediatly upon the arrival of his Canon, without further fear of any disturbance, he batters the Castle, and reduces the besieged, a hundred and fifty in number, to fuch ill terms, that they yielded upon condition to undergo the same punishment as should be inflicted on those were taken at Galargues, perswading themselves Aill, that Hannibalsto whom the house belonged, and who was

Bastard-

Bastard-brother to the Duke of Montmorency, would be able to prevail with him to save his Friends, and Allies: But Montmorency, to make his action more eminent at Court, having sent word that he had taken the prime Officers and Souldiers of the Sevences, the King commanded that all the Colonels, and other Officers should be hanged, and the common Souldiers sent to the Gallies; which the Prince having notice of, would not give him leasure to let the Court know what had happened at Monts; so that he caused threescore and sour to be hanged, which indeed were not all Officers; but many that were well clad, stilled themselves so, out of hopes to finde better usage; see how many times men gull themselves: The Duke of Rohan also, for his part, caused the like number to be hanged, not sparing any for their quality, except some sew, which he reserved, to fetch off some others, which Hanaibal had gotten to himself, who were afterwards exchanged.

In the mean time Montauban goes on luckily with the War, in which that Town, without the affiftance of any other, alwayes behaved it felf best of any of the Reformed Party. Saint Michil, before he engaged in any other enterprise, looks after the preservation of Causade, upon some jealousies he had of the Governour Chaftillon; for that in all Military actions he discovered too much effeminacy, and too much difregard of things relating to the security of the Town; but principally for that he held too frequent correspondencies with those of the adverse party, under pretence of procuring the enlargement of his brother, who had been a prisoner ever fince the last peace: Neither was he without some suspitions of the others aime to out him of his Government, which made him begin to think upon some way to preserve himself in it, to which end he Courts the affections of the Souldiers, and people of the Town; but before he had well made his Game, he most imprudently declared publickly, that he would no longer own any subordination to Saint Michel, who to prevent, and crusa this mischief in its birth, exhibited the Articles he had to charge Chastillor withall to the Council; whereupon it was ordered that he should be secured, and tried by a Council of War; which was neatly carried by Saint Michel, who very privately, and infenfibly having gotten many Souldiers into Causade, and coming thither himself unthought on, without any the least commotion, seizes upon Chastillon, and carries him to Montauban, where he was for a time kept prisoner, and examined: But whether it was, that the proofs against him were not clear enough, or that they feared left the punishing of him would be a discouragement to other strangers; he was fet at liberty

Book IV. The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. 185 liberty again; and Pontbeton was made Governour of Caufade in his place; who continued in that command untill the Peace.

Saint Michel having thus fecured this Town, thinks upon taking in of many small Forts, and Castles, which were a great diffurbance to Montauban; having now a fit opportunity offer'd him by the plague, that had driven away most of the Garrisons the Duke d' Esparaon had left about him; in pursuance of which he drawes his Canon into the Field, and begins with the Castle de La Motte d' Ardne, and having battered, and taken it by affault, fired it on the second of September: When he came back to Montauban, he had intelligence of a great body drawing up, composed of the Countrey Forces, and some other Regiments also, sent for purposely to oppose his designs: On the 6th. of the same Moneth he lays an Ambuscade for them among the Vineyards of Dieu-Pantole, about two leagues distant from Montauban, and with his Horse goes to draw them into it, and meets them in the plain of Castalans, and Saint Porquier, where the enemy, without expecting till the rest of their men were come up, or indeed staying one for the other, pursue him in disorder up to the very Ambuscade, where being once engaged, he charges them on every fide, and leaves some four or five hundred of them dead upon the place, besides a great number of wounded, losing not above three or four of his own: Thence he marches up to the very Towns of Castalans, and Saint Porquier, and other Villages, and Farms, which he fired, and then returns to Montauban. The next day he besteges the Castle of Ville-Dieu; which having endured the battery a whole day, yielded the next; those within it had their lives given them, but they remained priioners of War, and the place was burnt. On the 8th. of October he went from Montauban to besiege Escalicz, about two leagues from Montauban; but those of that Garrison stayed no more for him, then did those of Blavet, both which retreated to Salvagnac; these two Forts he also burnt: And because Mouliere Governour of Villemur, had now his Regiment on foot, he was very desirous to invite him into an Ambush also, which he endeavoured to do, by firing the Mills of Villemur, which were in fight of the Town, whence yet none would ftir out; in his return thence he came before the Castle of Poulauron, which he

The Garrison of Salvagnac being thus re-inforced with those of Escaliez, and Blavet, began now to grow insolent, and would no longer stand to the Agreement made with those of Montauban, to suffer them freely to pass, and repass; whereupon he laid an Ambush for them also; to allure them to which, he sent out fixty Horse, and fisty Foot, when presently came forth an hundred, or six score Souldiers, to gain the Ford upon the River Teseou, where they met with such entertainment, as very few of them ever went back again.

About the beginning of November fallied out fixty seven Souldiers from the Garrison of Loubejac, to lay an Ambush near Montauban, upon the great Road to Negrepelisse; which Saint Michel having notice of, drew out some Horse, and layed a Counter-Ambuscade in the way by which they were to retreat; and charging them in an open field, sew about threescore and sour of them; and after this, took the Castle of Bourquet by Petard. Many other little actions passed there at Montauban, in which San: Michel alwayes came off with honour.

It is now time to return to the lower Languedoe, whither presently after the taking of Monts, came the newes of the Reddition of Rochelle, after the long sufferings of that poor people, had given such large testimonies of their invincible constancy.

The Rochellers upon the retreat of the second Fleet, sent four several Messengers to England, with instructions all to the same effect; viz. To represent unto the King, the deplorable condition they would suddenly be reduced to, and minding him of his promises, to beseech his Majesty with all speed to send them some relief, assuring him withall, that how many, and heavy soever their pressurers, they would not submit to them, but wait his answer: La Grossetiere, who was one of the sour, arrived there on the 15th. of June, and was sent back again with many sair promises on the 30th. but in his return was taken, carried to the King, kept a prisoner till the Town was taken, and was then put to death. The 10th, of July following came the second, and on the 14th. arrived the third; but the last, who came about by Holland, was some-what longer on his way.

Before the arrival of la Grosseirere, had the King of great Britain dispatch't la Lande with two other Souldiers, to give the Rochellers notice of the great supplies he was preparing for them; and after him was also sent Champsteury with the like assurances, who got into Rochelle, but one day before the Fleet shewed it self in the Rode: The ships preparing for this expedition being not yet sinished, the Engineers pitched upon a new invention, to wit, the letting out of three ships lined, and the decks covered with brick, and laden with stones of an immense bigness, and stuffed with barrels of powder, to make these Mines play effectually upon the Barricado the French had made in the

Port:

Port: But the King of England very much unfatisfied with the flow progress of the Fleet, went himself in person on the last of July to hasten it, in which journey the Duke of Soubize waited on him.

The Duke of Buckingham staying behind, sets his wits on work to find out some means to obstruct the sending away of the supplies, and to this end, endeavours by the means of the Venetian Residents in England, and France, to have some overtures for a peace made: But seeing that took not, he resolves upon a journey to Portsmouth; but before his departure, sends of Vincent, a Minister of the Church of Rochelle, and makes him write a perswaste letter to the Kachellers, to dispose themselves to accept of thepeace the Duke of Buckingham was now procuring for them; which the Embassadour of Savoy having an inkling of, he plainly demonstrates to Vincent, that it was only an invention to retard the departure of the Fleet, and so deseated that project.

At length, on the 24th, of August, comes the Duke of Buckingham to Portsmouth, and on the 29th. arrived there fifty ships, some men of War, and others laden with provision, and ammunition: But on the second of September, the Duke of Soubize going to visit the Duke of Buckingham, as he had newly dined, he told him that just then he had received intelligence of the re-victualling of Rochelle, and that he was now going with the newes to the King; and as he was lifting up the Hangings to go forth of the Room, he was stabbed with a Knife, into the great Artery of the heart, by an Officer, whose name was Felton, of which he fell, and dyed immediatly: Nor were the Duke of Soubize, and his followers free from danger, it being muttered in the Chamber, that it was a French-man had done this act; but Felton, who might have easily escaped, if he had lifted, having not been observed by any one, voluntarily discovers himself to be the Authour of this Homicide; faying, that it was better that two men should perish, than a whole Kingdom. The next day the Kingmakes the Earle of Lindsey Admiral, Morton Vice-admiral, and Montjoy Reare-admiral; the other commands were not changed, but the same Captains that were in the former expedition, went also in this, with a greater force, but the same resolutions. After the death of Buckingham, it appeared that not half of the Ammunition and Provisions for the Fleet were yet shipped; and that should the prosecution of their businessanfwer the flowness of the beginnings, there would be yet three moneths work more to do; but by the care, and presence of the King, more was now dispatch't in ten or twelve dayes, than in many weeks before; so that all things being now ready, they set saile on the eighteenth of September: That which made the Duke of Soubize conceive better hopes of this than the former Fleets, was the care and diligence used by the King, and the command he gave his Admiral, in his presence, not to do any thing without his advice; committing the charge of this expedition conjoyntly to them both.

On the nine and twentieth of September came the Fleet into the Rode of Rochelle, and after a calm, which continued all Sundry and Mardry following, at night the Wind arose, and fate faire for a fight, so that about two houres before day, upon the Admiral's firing of a Gun, they all fet fayle, and at fix of the clock in the morning began a fight, which lasted about three houres, in which, on both fides, were discharged three or four thousand piece of Canon, and that was all: The next day about the fame houre was the fight renewed, but more temperately, and at a greater distance, so that both those fights were concluded without any great loss to either side: On the third of October comes up to them Friquelet a Captain that had formerly served under the Duke of Soubize, and coming, as he said, from Tremblade, they's a Letter from the Captain Treflebois, defiring him to know of them whether they would hearken to a Treaty of peace or no; to which was answered, that he should shew his pass-port, or else that Treslebois should come up in his Shalloup between the two Fleets, and there let them know what he had to fay; which, on the seventh of the same moneth, he did, with one whose name was de l' Isle, both who were remitted to Mortague and Forain, who, finding that they had no particular Commission, but came only to know whether the French would Treat apart, excluding the English, answered them, that that could not be, and so both retired to their own Parties: Nevertheless upon occasion of this interview the Admiral sent Mortague with a Datch Gentleman whose name was Kimphausfer, under colour of demanding of some Mariners, that were Prisoners in the French Fleet; but his going thither again the two dayes following, pretending they had promifed to shew him the Barricado in the Port, and confessing, at his return, that he had not seen it, because the Tide did not serve, bred some jealoufies, that he went thither upon some other design; And when, upon a report that there had Articles mutually passed between them, the Dake of Soubize complained that they had entred upon a Treaty, unknown to him, and without the Privity of those that were principally concerned in it; it was flatly denied: But when the continual goings to and fro of Montague, had confirmed

Book IV. The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. 189 med their suspicions of a Treaty, it was put off with this excuse, that they treated of things not relating to theirs nor the Interests of France: And not long after, the Admiral sent Montague into England, with a pass which the Cardinal of Richeliu gave him.

On Sunday the one and twentieth of this moneth there hapned a remarkable passage; one Pojanne, a Captain that had formerly served under the Duke of Soubize, a Villain covered with Crimes, and that had now redeemed his life, by the engagements he had passed to the Cardinal, to kill, or burn Soubize in his ship, fets faile out of the River of Beardeaux, in a good thip of two hundred Tun burthen, and filled with Combustible matter; and, the better to ralliate his design, rasses as an enemy, making prize of feveral French he met withal, and fo gets up to the English Fleet; When he was come in among them, he tells them that he was come to ferve the Party of the Religion as he had formerly done, and defires to be conducted to the Duke of Soubize who knevy him very vvell: With him vvas a Gentleman of Anjou, vvho, as he vvas going to Rochelle, had been cast upon the Coast of Spaine, there taken, and thence fent to the Cardinal, who finding him to be a bold and adventurous person, premised him not only his raidon, but infinite recompences in case he would accompany Pojanne in this enterprize: The defire he had to fave himself tegether with the perswassions of his brother, who was a servant to the Cardinal, made him promise whatever they required of him: But when they came to the fleet, he unfolded the whole plot to Soubize, whereupon Pojanne was taken Prisoner, his ship and Prizes seized on: And to prove that this Gentleman faid nothing but truth, he offered to get through into Rochelle with the Cardinal's pass, and to return thence with a true account of the condition of the place: His offer was accepted of, and double Letters were given him, some of which he shewed to the Cardinal, importing a request to permit him to make this Voyage, and a promise at his return to give him a perfect relation of his discovery. Thus he got in, and returned with other private Letters, which truly represented the state of Rochelle, which was so sad, that in case they were not relieved within two dayes, there would be none left alive in it, and that they were now upon the point of yielding.

On Monday the two and twentieth, about tenacleck in the morning the Fleets made as though they would engage, but the Captains failing of their premited duty, the whole time was front in Canonades, without any projudice to either party, and all the fire-ships were so ill-managed, that they were vainly, and to no purpose consumed: And in the mean time, in fight of that Puissant Fleet, so well stored with all necessaries, while the time flipt away, the passage unattempted, nor the Duke of Soubize his offers, to lead the way with the French, defiring the Admiral but to follow him only, accepted, nor those of the Count de Laval, while the others were engaged in the fight, to conduct the three ships lined with brick, and in which were the Artificial Mines, up to the Barricado; the famine finished its work in Rochelle; there being hardly a man left that could support himself without a staff; all that were left alive were so few, and so debilitated, that they had not strength to handle their Armes; so that on the same day the Admiral of England had resolved with his Council, once more to attempt the relicving of it, the Rochellers capitulated, and yielded on the 28th. day of October; and on the Ioth, of November following, the whole Fleet left the Rode, and returned towards England: The miscarriages of this action being imputed to the refractoriness and disobedience of some particular Captains; some of them were confined to their own houses, and a Commission was issued out for their Trial: But in a short time after, all this vanished, and they received their pay as the rest did.

The Duke of Rohan's Mother, nor his Sister, would not suffer any particular mention to be made of them in the Capitulation; left the occasion of the surrender should be impured to their persyasions, or the respect borne to them; not doubting however, but that they should equally enjoy the benefit of the Treaty with the rest: Bur, the interpretation of Articles being commonly made by the Conquerours, it was the Judgement of the King's Council, that they were not comprised in them, fince they were not mentioned in them: An unpresidentable severity, that a person of her quality, of seventy years old, coming out of a besieged Town, where she and her daughter had lived three moneths together upon Horse-flesh, and four or five ounces of bread aday, should be detained Prisoners, prohibited the exercise of their Religion, and so strictly guarded, that they had but one fervant allowed to attend on them: But all this rigour abated not their wonted courage and zeale to the welfare of their party: For the Dutchess sent to her son the Duke of Rohan a Caution, not to give any credit to her Letters; for that in this restraint she might be compelled to write things contrary to her inclinations, and that the confideration of her miferable condition should not impell him to any thing that might prejudice the Party, whatever mischief befell her: A truly Christian

Christian resolution, and nothing varying from the whole course of her life, which though it had been a continued texture of afflictions; yet, by the affistance of God, with such fortitude comported the her self in them all, that she has justly merited the applause and benediction of all good people; and will yield posterity a mest illustrious example of an unparallelable vertue, and admirable piety. Thus this poor Town, once the Cabinet and delight of Henry the Fourth, is now become the Subject of the wrath and Triumph of his Son Lewis the Thirteenth: It was assaulted by the French, abandoned by the English, and buried in a grievous and merciless Famine; but in the conclusion, has, by its constancy, gained a more glorious Renown in succeeding ages, than those, whose uninterrupted prosperious and merciles ages, than those, whose uninterrupted prosperious and acceptance ages.

rity makes them the envy of the present.

This newes caused a wonderful and general dejection among the whole Party, every one casting about, how to make his own peace; and many made publick addresses to that end, alledging, that fince Rochelle was now loft, for whose preservation only they had taken up Armes, it was necessary that they also should make their own compositions, before a greater extremity befell them; On the other fide the Romanists, by means of the Confederates they had in the Townes of the Religion, infused suggestions into them, perswading them to a speedy compliance, and that their early submission, would procure them a better reception; offering withal, large recompences to those that could induce their Corporations to send their Deputies to the King, who at the same time also, published a Declaration, wherein he premifed to receive again into his favour and protection, any particular persons, or Towns that should petition him to that effect.

The people wearied and ruined with the Warre, and whose spirits naturally stoop to adversity; the Merchants discontented at their loss of Trading; the Citizens grieved to see their houses burnt, and their lands lie idle immanured, and untilled, all encline to a peace upon any terms whatsoever: But of all others the distemper of Castres was the greatest, by reason of the divisions between Chavagnae and Saint Germier, who supported by the Consuls, and others, who stayed in the Town purposely to mischieve the whole party, who played their game so well with the Council of Albigeois, that they procured Deputies to be sent to the Duke of Rohan, to defire his presence, without which their ills were irremedible, and to summenhim, upon his promises, to convene a General Assembly, which might, together with him, take care of the publique affairs; giving the Deputies charge charge to return with his answer as soon as possible, that accordingly they might resolve on what they had to do.

This resolution, as also the election of the Deputies, was made contrary to the advice of Chavagnac, one of them being a Kinsman of Saint Germiers, yet was he fain to submit to it for The project of this message was grounded upon the the present. impossibility they conceived of the Duke's being able to come to them; and upon a belief, that were the way open, yet would he never curb his own power by a General Assembly; so that upon his refusal they promised themselves a fair and plausible pretence, to make their own particular peace, or at least, that making the Affembly their own, they should compel him to asfent to what they lifted: Which the Duke of Roban forefeeing, and having also, before the arrival of the Deputies, reflected on a General Assembly, as the only expedient, to preserve an entire unity among them, he condescended to all their defines; and that he might lose no time, took the Deputies with him to Nismes, where they made choice of Deputies for the lower Languedoc; thence went they to the Sevenes, where they did the like, leaving the time and place for the Convention to his determination: He sent them also Orders into Vivaretz to elect their Deputies too; and then, having taken Order for the gallant fortifications he had begun at Aimargues, and all Garisons necessary to be kept in the two Provinces, during his abfence, he takes all his Horse, and five hundred Foot, and with them comes to Castres about the beginning of December, where he found Rousseliere, whom the Inhabitants of Saverdun had driven out of their Town, by means of La Plante, his Lieutenant there, who fuffering himself to be seduced by their temptations, had drawn the Garison out of the higher Town, and given it up into their hands: This was also much promoted by the mis-intelligence happened between Mazaribal (whom the Duke of Roban, upon the death of Saint Estienne, had made Governour of Foix) and la Rousseliere; upon this occasion; for that Mazaribal his facility made him too much yield to the follicitations of some of the Inhabitants of Mageres (whose villainy was not then known to him, as he confessed afterwards, and that he took them for persons well-affected to the Party) to uphold the Enemies of la Rousseliere both in Saverdun, and Carlat; which made him requite his courtefie, by shewing fayour also to all against whom Migaribal had any Picque; and to fuch a height grew their animolities one against another, that Mazaribal obstructed, as much as he could, the payment of the Garison of Saverdan, and gave free passage to the Souldi-

ers that ran from la Rousseliere; which much elevated the spirits of his enemies, who cherished Mazaribal with hopes, that in case they could rid themselves of the other, they would receive him into his place; but when, upon the expulsion of the other, he had a minde to go thicher to reap the fruits of their promises, they reduced his train to a less number at the first, and thut their Gates upon him the second time; but protested notwithstanding to continue firm to the Party; which nevertheles, when they had sufficiently secured the place, they utterly abandoned it, and presently made address by their Deputies; to the King. It was then but too late) that Mazaribal clearly perceived the wicked intentions of la Rousselver's enemies, whose Treachery he could not now sufficiently aggrazivate.

The first thing the Duke of Rohan did, when he came to Castres, was to affemble the two Colloques of Albigeois and Lauraguais, to acquaint them with the resolutions of the lower Languedoc, and the Sevenes, and to incite them, by the others example, to choose Deputies also for the General Assembly the like was also done by Montauban, Foix, and Rouergn: After this he end avoured to compose the difference between Chavagnac and Saint Germier, which was now grown into for formal a quarrel, that mutual challenges had paffed between them: But though Saint G rmier refused not to submit to a reconciliation, yet would be not condifiend to own Chavagnac, as his Superiour in the Town of Castres: But on the contrary he professed publiquely, and in private, and even in the Council-House, that he would oppose him in all things, and in all places. This made the Dake of Roban think of removing him into the lower Languedoc; to which end he offered him a Troop of Horse, and an honourable allowance to himself and his retinue; but his Partisans, seeing that this tended to the dissipation on of their faction, disswaded him from it, promising him withthat if he could find our any way to evade that employment, they would make him Master of their Town.

The Duke also, finding the great scarcity of Corn was in Castres, to supply that want, gets them to resolve to borrow ten thousand Crowns to buy some; and offered them, during his abode there, sufficient Convoyes to conduct it safe thither: But seeing that could not be effected, he seeks out some other way to supply the necessities of the Town: And understanding that there was a great quantity at Saint Amant, which lies in the Valley of Maxamet; he claps a Petarde to the Town, and by that means enters it, and besieges the Castle, which being hardly pressed, yielded also, and at three or four Convoyes, was the greatest part of the Corn carried to Castres: This exploit was performed by Chavagnac: He sent also for more provisions to some of the Religion, that living as Neuters, hoped by that means to secure themselves against all parties.

He caused Donaret the first Consul of Realmont, who was a great instrument of the taking of the Town, to be tried, and executed; but with much difficulty, for that having married the President Montespieue, Neece (such persons seldom wanting Intercessours they were both to pronounce a sentence of Death against him: After this, the Winter came on so surjously, that he could not proceed in his intended Designe upon Brass.

Whiles he stayed at Castres, he also defeated two several negotiations for particular Peaces: The first was carried on by Dejan a native of Montauban, who having formerly bought the Office of Provost of the Town, which the Corporation opposed as a thing long before abolished, after a long suit, and a great expence of money he was faine to accept of what he had disbursed: This man being at the Court, had fresh hopes given him of this Office, in case he could effect any thing in this negotiation: To this Lure he stoops, and having his Commission disparched, comes away with two Letters from Galand; one for Montauban, and another for Castres. At the first place he was refused, and referred to the Duke of Rohan; and as for the second, he durst not go directly thither, but approaches as near it, as Bouquiere, which is about a League from it, and thence Writes to Dupuy, to let him know that he was very defirous to speak with him about a business of great importance; but he fent him word again, That he could not do it, unless he would first a quaint him with the nature of it: Whereupon he essayes a second time to prevail with him, but in vain; so that not daring to come into Castres, he was fain to return again without any further farisfaction: Thus his Voyage bringing no advantage to the Court, was nothing beneficial to himself neither who reaped no fruits at all of thosemany fair hopes were given him.

The other was managed by the Bishop of Mende, who was somewhat more zealous in it, as shall be seen in another place; but for the present he discovered himself thus far, and to the Duke of Rohan too; that being a servant to the Cardinal, he had received a Commission to Treat with particular persons, and Corporations, either severally, or conjunctively, and especially with

The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. 195 with him; that if he would hearken to him, he would procure him conditions, in which he should find what satisfaction he could defire; but if he would hear of none but a general Treaty, he must not expect so good; and so openly did he discover his purpoles, that Saint Michel Governour of Montauban, feart ing left he should engage in a Treaty without his Privity, fent 2 Servant of his own towards the Duke of Roban, to observe what was done, that the intelligence he should receive of the transactions there, might direct him how to steer his course; vyho > vvhen he favy that the Duke would not liften to a Man not impowered by any Commission, nor admit of any clandestine or particular Treaty, discovered himself, and told him, that he was fent to inform him from the Governour, that the Bishop, had made some overtures to him concerning a particular Treaty for Montauban, but that he had rejected his Propositions; nevertheless if he had any inclinations to a general Treaty, he was very well acquainted with him, and could do him much fervice

On the other fide, the Bishop nothing satisfied with Rohan's answer; and rightly conjecturing, that his presence would be injurious to his design; resolves to have patience, untill his return into the lower Languedoc; that in his absence he might the more effectually prevail upon the several Corpora-

There remained nothing more now, than by a Provident fore-fight, to prevent all inconveniencies, might intervene at Castres, during his absence: To this end he settles in the Confulate persons of great integrity, and no less fidelity to himself, banishing from the Town three of the old Consuls, and some others also, of whom he had great jealousie; and placed there four Companies of Foot, for whose subsistence he also provide ded: The business of Saint Germier was the only thing he could not handsomely cleare, because he had absented himself from the Town; which obliged the Duke of Rohan to make an Order, prohibiting Chavagnac, and the Consuls, to give him, or any of his brothers, any admittance into it; and, in case he came not in to them within the space of eight dayes, to Proclaim him a deserter of his Party: He sent also a Company of Foot into Roque-courbe, and another into Viane; forbidding them also to receive Saint Germier and his prothers, and leaves three hundred Men, which he brought out of the lower Languedge, in Saint Amant, where, for their maintenance, he allotted them their proportions out of a part of the Corn was found there. When

When he had done this, he went with the Deputies of the General Affembly towards Nifmes, where he faw the fform was like to fall, and where his prefence would be most necessary; and conceiving it also a very convenient place for the General Affembly, made no long delays after his arrival there, before he form-

The first and most important affair that fell under their confide ation, was that of Cafties; Saint Germier, after the departire of the Dake of Robin thence, animated by the Fugitives of c. f. s, and importanted by those of his Faction, that were lett in the Fourn, hom his Mother, and his Wife, whose Sex priviledged their stay there cherished in their discontents resolves " to return thither again, and indeed he himself was the fourth man that came to the Gate, and meeting with no opposition there, he goes up directly to his quarters, where therty or forty persons flocking to him, perswade him to go out into the Market-place, affuring himschat all the people would joyn with him, Chavagnac, who was then at Church, liaving notice of his arrival, raifes his Garrison, commands his own Troop to make ready, and resolves to charge him, wherever he should meet him; but his Lieutenant, l' Espuguet, being very opportunely mounted with about twenty of his men to go out upon a party, hearing the Alarme, goes directly to the place where Saint Germier was, and without taking any other notice of him, charged him bravely; in which action he received five wounds, and lost one of his men; but he flew and wounded many of the others also, whom he so scattered, and dispersed, that they had no more mind to rally again. Upon this rumour, the Confuls and Confiftory interpose in the business, and instead of detaining him prisoner, too charitably mediate for his quiet departure again: This is that which usually ruines all publick affairs, the indulgence shewen to offenders, under the goodly pretence of piety and clemency. which in other mens matters every one cries out for, when as their own particular interests will not endure to hear them mentioned.

This mild comportment of theirs towards Saint Germier; instead of pacifying, renders him more haughty than before, puffing him up with a vain opinion, that this courtesse was an effect of their fear; so that encouraged by his followers, and by the assistance of many Thieves, and Villains, that had sheltered themselves in Roque-Courbe, he gets into it, drives out the Garrison, and makes himself Master of the place; the Assembly General fore-seeing the evil consequences this would produce, sent a Deputy to Castres, with order to communicate his

Commission

Commission to Chavagnac, and the Council of the Province? and to endeavour to compose this difference, by submitting it to the determination of Arbitrators; to the end they might not provoke Sain Germier to give away the Town; which being now in his possession, he laughed at all mentions of an Accommodation; fo that the Deputy at his return reported to the Assembly, that all he had been able to do, was to confirm Roque-Courbe in their resolutions for the Resormed party, which they had anew engaged themselves by Oath, never to relinquish; but that for the present it was impossible to dispossess Saint Germier of it; but yet that there was great probability that a little patience, together with his imprudence, would give them what they aimed at; and in effect, a few dayes after, when he urged the Inhabitants to declare for the King, who knew well they must then submit to a Romish Garrison, they turned many of his Faction out of the Town, which foterrified him, that thinking himself no longer secure there, he leaves the place also, and goes with them to Cam, a house not far from it; which when Chavagnac had intelligence of, he besieges, and takes him, and one of his brothers, with fifteen, or fixteen others, half Romonists, and half of the Reformed Religion, whom he fent to the Duke of Robin; And yet after fuch actions as these, found he many Advocates, who deemed it too great a feverity to detain him prisoner, r'll the peace, and seemed also much discontented that his whole equipage was not restored him, and a Troop of Horse given him, that he might serve the party as formerly, and this was the conclusion of this affair.

And now the Bishop of Mende renewes the pursuit of his design, with an Essay upon Montauban, to which end he sent thither Vieres, a Gentleman of Quarty, who seigned himself to be of the Religion, and wrote to the Town to this effect, that being now going with the Kings Pass-port to wait upon the Duke of Roban, with some proposals tending to the general advantage of them all, he would not proceed in his journey before he had acquainted them with them, which if they pleased to receive from his Relation, he was consident they would approve of them.

It was not thought fit to admit him into the Town, for fear of the danger might ensue; but yet the natural curiosity of the French, at such a time, when every one breathed nothing but desires of a peace; made them very sollicitous to know what he had to say: Wherefore they sent four Commissioners to receive his message, whom he told, that being of the Religion himself, he could not but be very zealous for the general welfare of their party, and that the B'shop of M'nde having full power to treat, he was going from him, to the Duke of Rohan, and the general Assembly, with some propositions to that purpose; which, that they might be the better reflected, and that their Town might also have their part of the thanks, and benefit thence accruing, he advised them to send thither some Deputies also, offering the Kings Passfor their safe conduct; when this was reported to the Common-Council of the Town, they approved of the advice, and presently made choice of some Deputies, of which they also advertised the Assembly.

The Duke of Rohan had great jealouties of this Vieres, whom he had a long time known for a notable cheat; nevertheless, with great impatience was this Address expected; the report of which being generally divulged, suspended all other thoughts, every one hoping to derive fom advantage from it; three weeks passed without any further mention of its at length came a dispatch From Montauban, importing, that they had receiv'd intelligence from the Bishop, that he could not obtain the Pass-poits promised by Vieres; but that if they pleased to send their Deputies to perswade the General Assembly to accept of such a peace, as the King should vouchsafe to accord them, and in case they refused zo comply, that they themselves were resolved to submit to his pleasure, he would engage himself for the safe conduct of their Deputies: This discovered the vyhole fallacy to the Tovyn, and made them resolve anevy to remit all propositions for peace to the General Affembly, which they exactly observed in that, made them by the Marshal de la Force, to this effect, that the King vvas refolved not to iffue out any Declaration for a general peace; nevertheless, if they would Treat every one particularly, the King admitting of all fuch Treaties, and refusi. g a peace to no Tovvn, it vvould at last insensibly prove a general one.

When this business of Montauban vvas over, came a very urgent dispatch from Vivaretz, grounded upon this occasion, that the Army vvhich lay before Rochelle, after the taking of the Toven, vvent under the command of Tovas into Auvergae, to refresh themselves, and that they were now upon a March towards the upper Vivaretz, to go thence to Valence in Dauphine, there to wait the arrival of the Kingsthis their so near approach, gave the whole Countrey a hot Alarme; especially Sojon; which Chevrilles about six Moneths before had seized, and fortished; so that with great instancy they demanded a supply both of men and ammunition. The lower Languedoc surnished them with sisteen hundred men, the command of which was given by the Duke of Roban to Saint André de Monibrua as his field

Marshal, with whom were also sent the Horse belonging to Casfugue, who about three moneths before, was taken prisoner; to whom in this place I must give his merited honour, publishing to the World with what generosity he with-stood both the Menaces, and Flatteries of the Court; for, he being the first Conful of Nismes, and of great authority, and reputation there; they hoped by his means to raise a powerful faction there, and wholly take off that Town from their adherence to the Resormed

Party, But to return to those of Vivaretz, all whose fears the King's Army having transported with them over the Rbone into Dauphine, they countermand the Troops were coming to their affiftance, which turned to their great prejudice; for that being now a burthen to the Duke of Roban, who knew not yet well how to difpose of them, he was feign to seek out some employment for them, between Vivaretz, and the Sevenes; and to this end he sent Saint André orders to make an attempt upon Saint John de Valle-Francisque; and for the more convenient profecuting of a defign upon Villeforte or Postes, to secure Genovillac, and Chamberigand; he begins with Saint Fobn, which he takes, as also the Fort of Chamberigand, and some other places, which were like to incommode him, and then takes up his quarters at Genovillac; whence he marches with intention to block up Villefart; but finding the Marquess de Portes upon the way with 2 greater power than his, ready to dispute the passages with him; he forces him from them, and so advances to Ville-fort, thinking to have lodged his men in the Suburbs; but being not able to effeet it, he retires to Genovillae, and Saint Germain, and thence informs the Dake of Rohan, that his men would leave all their Colours, unless they were drawn off thence; whereupon he gives orders for their quartering at Saint Ambroix, Barjac, Valon, and la Gorce; that they might be in a readiness to march to Privas, upon any occasion should summon them thither.

In the mean time came to him new affirances from England, that he should never be deserted, nor any peace made, without comprising the whole body of those of the Religion in France in general, and his Family in panicular; encouraging him also to a constancy in his resolution, and not to be dismayed at the loss of Rachelle: Prince Thomas also of Savoy sent a Gentleman to him, to let him know, that if he continued in his former humour, and would advance towards him, he would give the King a handsome diversion in Dauphine, and meet him upon the Rhone with ten thousand Foot, and a thousand Horse; to whom he replied, that he was now in a better humour than ever, and

The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. Book IV. ready to march upon the first summons he should receive from him.

The King in the mean time goes towards Dauphine, but because the plague was at Lyous Lodges at Vienas, and appoints the Rendez-vous to be at Grenoble, where preparation was also made of all things necessary for the relief and victualling of Cazal; the jealousies these preparatives raised in the Duke of Savoy, made him look about him in several quarters, there being an Army in Province ready to fall upon Nies; another in Brissa to keep Savoy in awe, and the King himself matching with the third to the streights of Susa, which is the Key of Piedmont; so that the Duke was sain to divide his Forces, that he might be ready to defend himself in any part where the storm should fall, and to call in the Spanish Forces to affish him in the desence of Susa.

The present state of affairs, gave great probabilities that the King would now have employments enough to divert him a long time from looking after those of the Religion; and upon occasion of some reports dispersed among the people of Nim s, that if they had any inclinations to fue for a peace, all necessary Passports for their fafe conduct should be given them; the Assembly rook care to enquire after the Authours, and truth of these Rumours; but finding them to be all fictions, and the inventions of some Counsellours of the Presidial of Nismes, or of some of the Inhabitants that had been expulsed the Town; or of some of Aiguemortes, some of them set on by the Duke of Montmorency, others by the Marquels of Varenness, out of an intention to ruine them, by fowing divisions among them, rather than to procure them any good; the Affembly made a Decree, that all persons that had any proposa's or overtures to make for a peace, should fift bring them to the Assembly, that they might be examined bythem, and improved to their advantage; expressely prohibiting also all persons from such clandescene, and malicious buzzing of reports among the peo; le, to take them off from proceeding in the Fortifications they were then upon.

And next they fell upon the confideration of a course to procure a firm and lasting peace; whereupon they laid down this for an infallible ground, that it could not be such, unless it were made conjoyntly with the King of England; neither could he himfelf procure any upon so good terms, without a previous discent into France, whither he was now invited by so many considerable emergencies to savour him in the enterprise; the King being now at the other end of his Kingdom with his best Forces, prosecuting a design, was to be executed without it; where he should have to oppose him, the Forces of the Emperour, the King of Spain, and the Duke of Savoy. To this effect a letter was written to him in the name of the Assembly, and the Duke of Rohan, befeeching him to embrace this offered opportunity, and confirming the protestations formerly made by those of the Religion in France, not to engage in any Treaty, but conjoyntly with him: And for as much as their want of money was great, and that without some Forrain assistance, it was impossible to keep their men together, or advance their Fortifications, the Duke of Roban was follicited to write to Claufel, that they could no longer subfift without a supply of money, and that he should let the Spaniards know, that the peace of France could be no longer prevented, without a fudden recruit. It was also resolved, that they should endeavour to procure some private Pass-ports, that they might with more fecurity send into England; upon assurance to be given to dispose all things to a peace: Du Cros of Montpellier, who, with the confent of the Marquess de Fosse, came to give the Duke of Roban a visit, returned from him with the same promise, which was also confirmed by the whole Assembly.

Thus were they careful not to omit any thing that tended either to their own defence, or the procuring of a peace, even at fuch a time, when they had fairer hopes of good fuccess in their affairs than ever; but God, who had otherwise determined of them, blasted all their projects: For the King, who lest not Payis, to go to the relief of Cazal, till he had privately gotten an affurance out of England, which freed him from the fear of any invasion thence, whil'st he was engaged in that expedition, and made him confident of a peace with that Nation, excluding the Reformed Party, would not admit of any addresses from them, fearing lest they might prevail so far upon him, as to induce him to alter his determinations concerning them: To which may be added, that surprizing his enemies by a nimble march, in the dead of Winter, he easily gained the straits of Susa, and immediatly after the Town also; which brought so great a terrour on them all, that Don Ganzales raised his siege from before Cazal; the Duke of Savoy also, to prevent the loss of Piedmont, sollicited for a peace, by which he was obliged to re-victual Cagal The King, that he might himself witness the performance of all Conventions, remained about a moneth longer in that Countrey: And then leaving Trivas with four thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse in Montferrat, and the Marshal Crequi with the like number at Sufa, bent all his thoughts, and the rest of his Forces upon the War in Languegic; in order to which he commanded the Marshal Schomberg to advance before to Valence, to receive the Forces that were coming out of Bressa, and the parts about Lyons, to cause the Train, and all other necessaries to be made ready, and to conclude a Treaty already begun with Chevrilles concerning Vivaretz: To the Duke of Monimorency, he sent Orders to besiege Sojon; to the Duke of Guise, that he should deliver up his Army to the Marshal d'Estrée, who had a Commission to march with it into the lower Linguedoc, to ravage the Countrey about Nismes; not long after the King comes in person to Vilence with a sew Horse only, and a sew dayes after, the Cardinal arrives also with the rest of the Army; out of which were drawn sisteen hundred Horse, and sent under the command of the Duke of Trimoville, to joyn with the Marshal d'

Effree.

In the interim of these preparations the English Embassadour than residing at Thurin, gave the Duke of Roban notice of the peace concluded there; but that it was not like to be of any long continuance; that the Army was now marching towards him, but in so tattered a condition, that if he could but stand the first shock, he would soon find such diversions made, as would be much to his advantage. Claufel encouraged him yet much more with promises of a sudden supply both of Arms and Money. Nismes, and Aimargues went but flowly on in their Fortifications, Vsez a little better; but yet no Town would give quarter to any Souldiers, till they were upon the point of being befreged; which drove the Duke of Robin to his usual way of offering to each particular Town to pull out for them, the Thorn, that pricked them: And first he addresses himself to Sauve, with over-tures of an attempt upon Corforme, whither he goes; but findes it a matter of greater difficulty, than his information had given him cause to apprehend; for having battered their Works, the Walls were not to be scaled, but with Ladders of a very great length; To that those he had brought with him proving too short, he was necessitated to make all new again; which gave the Marshal d' Estrée, (urged by the Marquess de Fosse) leasure to march to the relief of it with fix thousand Foot, and four hundred Horse; whereupon the Duke drew off again to Sauve; and the next day being defirous to view the Marshal's Army as it marched, and who then took up their quarters at Sommieres; it was demonstrated to him, that he could not get back again to Saint Gilles, but he must pass the Vistre near to Aimargues; or the Gardon, if he intended to go for Vivareiz, as it was reported he did, at both which places he might with ease be discovered, and with advantage fought with: The Duke, that he might not lose this opportunity, writes to Vsez for some more Forces,

Book IV. The Memoires of the Duke of Rohan. and sends Aubais to Nismes for the same purpose; Lesques goes to Auduze for others, accompanied by Goudin, and la Baume; he fent also to Saint Hippolyte, and the neighbouring Garrisons for more Auxiliaries, appointing his general Rendez-vous to be at Vanvage; and he himself sets out by break of day with two thousand Foot, and fourscore Horse, to secure Canisson, a large, but unfenced Town, whence he might be fure to take his advantage which way foever the Marshal should take; but whether it was that he had the same design upon Canisson; or that he had intelligence of the Dukes marching thither with fo small a Force: he found him also upon his march from Sommieres towards Caniffon; nevertheless the Duke having the advantage of the way, goes on directly to the Town, and there began to secure the avenewes of it with his Van, that the rest, (considering he was purfued by an Army twice stronger than his own) might in good order possess themselves of the Town; but the extream hear of the day, and fame of the good Wine, wherewith that place abounded, had already drawn thither the greatest part of his Officers, fo that it was impossible for him to govern them; when on a sudden he heard many Musquets in his Rear, which was then skirmishing with five hundred Musquetiers, which the Marshal had fent before to try if they could break it; whil'ft he, with the rest of his Army stayed upon a little Hill which gave him a view of all the Countrey, and what was done even in Caniffon it felf, whence perceiving the great and general confusion there, he gave Orders for a general affault: The Duke of Rohan commanded Montredon to rally his men, together with Carlincas, Infign of his Guards; whileshe himself draws out a hundred of his own Guard, whom he led up to the Castle of Canisson, which being seated on a little Hill, commands the Town, and circumjacent quarters, fo that it is not eafily affaultable on any Ede, enjoying them strictly to look well to the defence of that place. This done, he goes round the Town, which he begins to fortifie with strong Barricadoes; just as he had finished his circuit, he meets with Leques, Goudin, and la Baume, and tells them that of necessity they must resolve to defend the out-places, untill the Barricadoes were finished: Liques undertook the affair, goes to the head of his men, and feeing that the Souldiers that were in the Castle, had quitted it, hastes thither with others, whom he placed in their rooms; and so eagerly disputed he his post without the Town, that when he would have retreated thither, he found the enemy had intercepted his passage, so that he was fain to take the Field: La Baume was also ferved in the like kinde; as for Goudin, the Duke would not suffer him, by rea-

Ion of his wound, to that himself up in the Town; but when he had taken the best course he could to preserve his Foot, he drew off with his Horsetto Nismes to hasten away the relief he had before fent thither to prepare.

In the mean while Montredon, the Major General, la Boiffiere, and Alizon, after they had from post to post, disputed the out-quarters, retreated into Caniffun, where they had no fooner taken their several posts to defend, but they received a general and furious affault; but necessity animating the Defendants. they bravely repulfed the Affailants; and whiles they looked on, perfected their Barricadoes; then got the enemy into fome houfes, which they began to break through, thinking by that way to open themselves a passage into the Town, but they were soon fired from that attempt; this from lasted from Noon till Night; Officers within behaved themselves with much gallantry, both in rallying, and encouraging their men; but Montredon, la Boiffiere, and Alizon, who commanded in chief, got most honour in this action; both parties had their inconveniencies; those within wanted ammunition, those without provisions; so that, that very night the Marshal d' Estrée, offered the besieged a Parley, which they rejected, telling him withall, that they should soon see the Duke of Roban there with fresh Forces, to make them remove farther off, and indeed that night had he fent two thousand men of Nismes, under the command of Aubais, to get as near Caniffor as possible, and to let the besieged know, that he was now come so far to their affistance; but he returned again, without giving them any notice of his arrival, either by Meffenger, or other fignal made, as he was expresly commanded; none daring to adventure on the employment; and indeed, so straitly, ere they invested, that it was impossible for any one to get into them this much troubled the Duke, who having refreshed his Troops, resolved to go thither in person, and either save his men, or lose himself: To which end he sent Leques Orders to have the Garrison of Aimargues in a readiness to joyn with him; but whil'st he was preparing for their relief, came newes to him of the capirulation, which was made upon these termes, That the besieged should with all security march off to the Sevenes; that the Marshal d' Estrée, should not enter the Town of Canisson with his Army; but that the faid Army should be drawn up in Battailla, at a great distance from the way they were to pass; that the wounded of both fides, which could not be carried off, should with all safety remain in the Town; and that for the performance of these Articles, Hostages should be mutually given; all which was punctually observed on both parts; of the party of those of the Religion

ligion were flain about fifty or fixty, and above double the number wounded: of the Romanists were there four hundred flain, and eight hundred wounded.

This was the issue of this action, in which the Duke of Rohan was very like to have received a check, would have proved fatal both to himself, and his Party too: But now imagining that it was not without cause that the Marshal so earnestly purfued this defign; but that his Forces were intended for the Countrey about Nismes, he conceived he would again pass the Viftre near Aimargues, that he might the sooner recover his quarters at Saint Gilles, which made him desirous yet once more to feehim; for which purpose he took two thousand of the Foot of Nismes, and his Horse, with whom he came to Aimargues; the next day he drew them up in a place between Aimargues and the Pass, with intention to charge him when he should be half over; which the Marshal having notice of, he changed both his design, and road, and lengthning his way a dayes journey, passed the River at Aiguemortes; and the Duke returned to Nismes: And seeing the preparations were making on all hands for the invasion of the lower Languedoc, and the Sevenes, he got the Towns of the lower Languedoc to receive their Garifons; affignes the Regiments of Goudin, Fourniquet, and Bonal, to Nilmes; those of la Baume and Faulgeres for Mez; and that of Sandres for Aimargues; After this, and the taking of the Fort of Sojon by the Duke of Montmorency, which con him but three dayes time, though Chevrilles had promifed to hold it out three weeks, the Duke of Rohan having learnt the particulars of the Treaty for Vivaretz, made by Chevrilles with the Keeper of the feals for twenty thousand Crowns; he thought it now high time to look after the securing of it; and sent Saint André de Montbrun with five hundred Foot, and some of Casfagne's Horse, to Privas, whither he got very happily, having defeated Montreal and l' Estrange, who waited for him at some untoward passes in his way, with a farre greater strength than his. At his arrival there, he found the Confuls with the Common Council affembled at the Town House; who told him that indeed they had formerly wished for his company, but that at present, they having no need of any Souldiers, it would be but a burthen to them; and yet, that they might with the better grace refuse to admit his party into their Town, promised to quarter them in the Villages that lay thereabouts; which Saint Andre perceiving, was the more resolute to quarter in the Town: Chevrilles who was then at Cheyla, was fent for in all haste, and coming thither the next day with those of his Faction, he presently assembles the Council of the Province, and of the Town too, to persuade them to request Saint André to return again, and that in case their intreaties were ineffectual, to induce him to it by the ill usage of his Men: which Saint André having notice of, he goes in to the Assembly, and there declares that he was sent thither, by the command of the Duke of Rohan, who only had power to recall him againe; and that whatever their determinations should be, he would not stime a foot thence without his Order: When Chevrilles saw himself thus fallen from his hopes, he tells Saint André; that in case the Town should be besieged, he would do them better service without than within the place; that he would raise fisteen hundred men, and would put as many of them into it, as he should think necessary, and with the rest would forrage and cut off the provisions from the King's Army. .

His proposition was well approved of, and on the morrow he departs: And not long after were there three Barques laden with Salt taken upon the Rhone: Saint Andre hafts thither, but came not time enough, for that some Frigots had already forced those that had taken them to quit their Prize: Nevertheless in this excursion he learnt that the King was come to Valence but with a small guard, believing, upon the information he had received concerning that particular from the Keeper of the Seals, that the Treaty of Vivaretz was absolutely concluded; but that finding that the coming of Saint André thither had altered the whole face of things there, he was now preparing for the Siege of Privas, which was to be blocked up within four or five dayes. Large offers was he tempted with, even to the value of an hundred thousand Crowns, but his generous refusal of them shewed him to be a person full of honour and fidelity: At his return to Privas he makes them all resolve to abide a siege, engaging them also by an Oath, that the first man, that should but mention a Capitulation, should be put to death! Then he assignesto every one their respective posts; and Orders the repairing of the out-works, to which, before his coming, nothing at all had been done; nor yet could he begin them, but the very day beforethe Town was invested, and yet such diligence used he in it, that some of them were made very defensible, and held out bravely.

The fiege was scarce begun, when the Cardinal came up with the rest of the Army that stayed behind at Susa: He presses Cheurilles to the performance of his engagement; who that he might not wholly lose the recompence of his Treason, desires to have a part in the honor of the Siege, offering to bring in with him 15.

hundred men; his offer was accepted, and he comes in, but all alone: The next day came a Trumpet from the King (accompanied with Argencourt) to fummon the place: Chevrilles, who failed not to be at the place, whither the Trumpet was to come, fent one of his Captains to know what he had to fay, which when Saint Andre was informed of, he hasted thither with all diligence, and sent him back again without any answer at all: Whereupon Chevrilles seeing him resolved not to give them time to deliberate, whether they should hearken to a Capitulation, or no, leaves them again the second time, carrying with him as many men as he could, and was alwayes the occasion that the Souldiers of Bouttieres went not thither to their affiftance, amusing them still with promises to conduct them thither time enough, by this meanes ruining the endeavours of those whom Saint André had sent thither purposely to invite them to their assistance.

He was no sooner gone, but Brunel of Anduze, who commanded five Companies of the Sevenes, confederating with the other Poltrons and Traitours, frames a conspiracy to kill Saint Andre in case he should refuse to surrender the place; and seconded by some of his Faction, threatens to give him up, if he denied to comply with them: Whereupon it was thought fit by the Council, that he should have a conference with Gordes, which he had, but they could not agree upon the conditions.

After that the Cardinal was come up to them, they more closely blocked up the place on every side, made their approaches and batteries, and then gave it an affault, from which they were bravely beaten off with the loss of many of their men; yet did this ftorm so terrifie the besieged, that they instantly urge Saint Andre' to give Gordes another meeting : But in his room was substituted, and sent Vennes a Captain in the Regiment of the Guards, who offered him very honourable terms for himself, and the Souldiers, but nothing at all for the Inhabitants; all which he refused, protesting that he would never desert them: When Saint André, at his return, gave the people of the Town an account of the interview, it struck so great a terrour into them, together with those of Vivaretz, that they all quit the Town, and flie to Bouttieres, leaving Saint André with five hundred men only to defend a place, which was not to be maintained under two thousand. In this extremity he conceives it his best course to draw off to the Fort of Toulon, where he might Treat with more security; it being impossible to force frim there in any short time, or without the loss of a great number of Men: About break of day Deffiat, Gordes, and Vennes, desire a conference with him, which he condiscended to; at which they make him no larger offers than of his own life only, in case he would abandon his Souldiers, which he generously rejected, and returned to embrace the same fortune with them: When they saw this made not any impression on him, they summoned him once more to fend some of his Officers to them with his final resolution: Brunel of Dauphine offering himself for this employment, was accepted of; three journeys made he to them, in which time being corrupted by the enemy, he returns from the last with an affurance of all their lives; but adding withall, that they would not give anything under their hands, untill Saint André, with some of his Captains had cast themselves at the King's feet to implore his pardon; and moreover that the Count of Soiffons, who was to present him to his Majefly, had given him a strict charge to tell him, that he should haste to him with all speed, that he must not now lose any time; and that he did with much impatience wait for him: Whereupon he affembles his Captains, who all earneftly importune him to go; which when he scrupled at, they break out into open reproaches against him, charging him with having enfinared them in a danger from which he would not endeavour to free Forced by their invectives, he goes out with five Caprains; Saint Preuil and Fourille conduct him into Saint Simon's Chamber, where, the Cardinal coming to him, told him, that fince he was come forth, without any parole given him, he was now a Prisoner: Then was he forced to write to those in the Fort, to advise them to yield at discretion, and that they should receive the same usage he did; who, refusing to credit those Letters, or Brunel, who was sent with them, desire to fee Saint André, who was conducted up to the Fort with a ftrong guard: As foon as they faw him, they imagined themselves sure of their lives, and thereupon resolved to give up the Fort: Those that first entred it, fired some barrels of powder, purposely to colour the cruelty they were commanded to execute upon those that were in it: Saint Andre and his Captains were kept Prisoners: Thus were most that were in the Fort betrayed to their destruction; some of the Prisoners being hanged, and others sent to the Gallies.

I have related the particulars of this affair, to let the world fee how that the perfidic of Chevrilles, the two Brunels, and of the most considerable persons in Privas occasioned the miserable destruction of their Town, and a great part of the Inhabitants, ruined the relief of Languedoc, and frustrated those of the Religion

ligion of an opportunity to obtain a very advantageous Peace; which, fince the publication of that with England (which was made during this Sieg.) they had entred on a Treaty upon with the Marquels de Fesse, who was to that end impowered by the King's Commission: But the taking of this place, as little dreamt of by the Romanists, as those of the Religion (considering their brave relistance at the beginning of the Siege) quite ruined that affair: For Die Cos had procured conference between Aubais, Dupuy, and Lucan, Deputies of the Affembly general, with the faid Marquess; and although at their first interviewshe refused to proceed, unless they would recede from their demands, concerning the demolition of the fortifications; yet with more advantage might they have Treated, while the King was further off, and Privas held out, than when he should come into the Sevenes, and there discover the Factions, weaknesses, baseness, and Treacheries, that were too frequent among those of the Religion.

The loss of Pivas, from whence was expected a longer opposition, surprized the whole Party with terrour and amazement: and put the Duke of Roban in mind, that it was now high time to go to the Sevenes, to take Order for the security of that Province, and to oppose the first attempts that should be made upon it: This Voyage was hitherto retarded by his fear to leave Nismes (which many endeavoured to seduce from its fidelity) till he had supplied it with Souldiers, which, untill compelled by necessity, they would not receive; and withall by reason that having resolved to leave Leques there to command in chief, in case it should be besieged, he durst not discover his intentions in that particular too foon, because he knew that Aubais aimed at the same command, and that he endeavoured by secret practices to render Leques odious to the people, and make himself to be defired by them: In the like perplexity was he for Usez, where Gondin ambitioned the Government, but was absolutely refused by the Inhabitants: Nevertheless, at length he sets our from Nismes, goes to Usez, and thence takes Faulgiere's Regiment with him to Aletz, and thence put it into Saint Ambroix, in hopes that the opposition that place would make, would give him more leafure to provide for the Sevenes, where he thought to have found a good fum of money ready raised, out of some Farms he had engaged for his Leavies; but the apprehension of the King's coming into those parts, made most of the Farmers refuse to disburse any: Upon their default he proposed another expedient, that the Bayliffs should advance the money for the Leavies, and that, for their re-imburfement both of the Principal and and Interest, should be affigured them not only the aforesaid Farms, but also an imposition then newly laid upon the Countrey; but all these inventions, being not of force to extract any money out of their purses, the Duke was fain to address himself to the Communalties.

In the mean time the Mathal d' Estrée, and the Duke of Trimoüille began to ravage the Countrey about Nismes, where there passed many handsome skirmishes, in which, those of the Town (who killed and wounded twelve or fifteen hundred of the enemy) had alwayes the better, except one day, when some of the Inhabitants, too inconsiderately advancing, were surprized by the Horse, who deals for roughly with them, that, besides those which were wounded, there remained forty dead upon the place, and had not Leques come in with fresh Troops, there had been much more mischief done: For his own part he was sorced from his Horse, which was killed under him; but the Forragers came not within Canon-shot of the Town.

The King on his fide loses no time, but after the taking of Privas, fends part of his Army towards Gorce and Barjac, which were given up into his hands: Beauvoir and Saint Florent make their peace, and then turn Brokers for the places belonging to the Reformed Party: The former of them comes to Saint Ambroix, to perswade the Inhabitants, to imitate the example of Barjac; which the chiefest of them were so ready to consent unto, that, had not the Souldiers interposed, the thing had been then done: Nevertheless they continue their correspondencies, fo that upon the King's approach, though he had no Canon with him, nor could have any come up to him within eight or ten dayes, fear united the two Factions in the Town, who before were at mortal odds, and both together force the Souldiery to a compliance with them, so that the Capitulation was agreed on, upon condition that the Souldiers should no more beare armes for the Reformed party: At which Article, when one of the Captains scrupled, the Duke of Montmorency told him, that none ever treated with the King upon any other termes, but that it was but a formality only, and obliged no man farther than he pleased himself: And then flatters one, and another, with promises of great rewards, if they would repaire to Aktz, and serve the King there, by joyning with the Count of Aletz, who had promised to give him up the Town: Thither then marched all the Souldiers from Saiat Ambroix, where they excuse themfelves by revolving all the blame upon the Inhabitants, who compelled them to yield the place; promising withall, that notwithstanding the Treaty, they would serve the Reformed party; wherever they should be commanded. The Duke of Rohan was then at Aletz, but had no Forces ready for service, but the Regiment of Foulgieres, and five or fix new raifed Companies; the King being then within three Leagues of him with all his Army, the people of Aletz very wavering, and uncertain whether they would stand upon their defence or no; and the Baron of Aletz, who had promifed to deliver up the Town, that he might the better effect it, would by all means be Governour of it; but the Duke was defirous to place aubais in that command, for that being Field-Marthal, every one would have submitted to him, and promised to leave with him all the best men he had; but he excufed himself; for that being refused, the Government of Nismes, he had taken up a resolution, never to stay within any besieged place. Then offers he it to Affaz, to whose age and experience every one would have born an honourable respect; but he also absolutely refused it: Whereupon he speaks to Evissiere concerning it whose modesty, no suffering him to think himself sufficient for it, made him refuse to accept of the charge, as Commander in chief; but offered to stay there as subordinate to aubais, or any other the Duke should think fitting; so that in this extremity he was fain to leave there one Mirabel, an old Gentleman of Vivaretz, of a weak fight, and as feeble lanbs: And when the King came to take up his quarters within a League of Alctz, the Duke of Roban took the Baron d' Aletz with him, and went thence that very morning before the Town was invested; promising, before his departure, to fend them what supplies of Souldiers he could possible; of which he took so great care, that at several times he sent them in above fifteen hundred; besides the Garrifon was there before, which at length he raifed to five and twenty hundred in the whole.

When the King saw himself frustrated of his hopes of gaining the place without force, he sent for his Canon, and, (that he might lose no time) began his approaches; part of the Town of Aletz is seated on a Plain, and the other so near the Hills; that they command above half of it; the River Gardoz runs so near the Walls, that it is rather prejudicial, than useful to the Fortifications; for that being but a small Torrent, fordable in most places, and running so near the Town, it leaves no space for any Flanker to be made; nor could it be fortified within the walles by reason of the houses which made a part of them; so that there was no way to secure that part of it, but by raising Works on the other side of the River, and Forts upon the little Hills, which command all a good distance from them, and muste be joyned by a Line of Communication to two great stone-bridges, which cross the River. In short, it was a work of vast labour and expence, nor could the Town be kept, but by a great number of men, which was the reason it was never till then fortified; But the people now feeing that Anduze was fortifying, would needs imitate their example; a malady which raigned in most of the Communalties of the Sevenes, and this discovered its infection, when the Duke was absent, and upon his Voyage into Foix; who though he well knew there were already more fortifications begun, then they had Souldiers to man, yet would he not cross them in their humour, for fear of vexing and discouraging them; there was yet this further milchief in it, that befides that, they took things beyond their power to accomplish; when once the first hear was over, they would not employ what they had as they ought, nor would they work, but when compelled by their fears; to which I must yet adde this, that when they were most intent upon the raising of these fortifications, it was imposfible to perswade them to store themselves with other necessaries requisite to the defence of their Town; for in such designs one expence draws on another; and if one of these four things be wanting, to wit, Good Works, Ammunition, Victuals, and Souldiers, all other provisions are but vain and fruitless.

This being the condition of this Town, they were very much furprized, having neglected to raise a third Fort, which omissions the Duke willing to redeem in great hast makes up one of Barrels; which flew in pieces at the first on-set, and on this side only did the enemy raife their Battery, between the Bridge, and the Duke d' Engoulesme's Garden; this first assault so terrified the Inhabitants, that they thought of nothing now, but how to make a handsome composition, to which they were incited, by the Captains that came from Saint Ambroin, and those of the Baron d' Aletz his Faction, whose follicitations wrought such dangerous effects, that they made Holes in their Walls to let the Besiegers in; which being discovered, the breaches were repaired, but the offenders not punished; fo that the mischief was only delayed, not remedied; and the diffificated made more industrious to conceal their Treacheries: Two or three of the aforesaid Captains anon their own request were sent to the Duke of Rohan, to inform him how weak the place was, both in men and refolutions to stand it out, that the numbers of the Garrison there before, and of the recruits fent thither fince, hourely decreased, by their continual flight from it; whereunto he replied, that what they had faid, could not be; that he very well knew what Souldiers he had left there, and whom he had placed over them, that he would daily

daily strengthen them with convenient supplies, both of menand Ammunitions; and therefore perswaded them to return again to them speedily, to animate them by their presence; which they, plainly refused, alledging once for all, that it was the next yvay to be hanged, confidering their engagements to the Duke of Minimoreacy, when they marched out or Sain Ambroix; whereupon the Dake being informed that they had had fecret conference with the Baron d Alatz, and that they had agreed together that his Cornet Meftigues should be fent in to dletz, he commanded they should be all apprehended, and fent Blacquiere this ther with a recruit of five hundred men, and an express command to kill the first man that should but mention a surrender; but the malady was then past cure, the Townsmen having hid away the ammunition, and deferted the most necessary Work of terraffing that part of the Wall which was opposite against the enemies Battery, fo that all he could do, was to protect the capitulation two or three dayes longer, and by that means lave five and twenty hundred men, which had they been loft, as were those of Privas, it would have deterred all others from any future engagement; that which was most fatal in this reddition. was the Article femblable to that of Saint Ambroix, which disabled them from evermore bearing Arms against the

As foon as the newes of this was brought to the Duke of Roban, immediatly he fent away Falquieres the Lieutenant of his Guards to Sauve, where the furrender of Aletz had flruck a general terrour into the Inhabitants; the most considerable of which, out of hopes of obtaining good conditions for themselves, by the savour of their Lord, the Count d' Aletz, denied to let him into their Town; but Falquieres, being of the place, and having much acquaintance in it, by the means of some Ladders he had procured, got in; but found the people so resolutely fixed upon an accommodation, that having seized upon the Casse, and a Tower which commanded the Town, and served it instead of a Citadel, told him openly, that they were now resolved to seek out some way to preserve what they had lest, and not expose them felves to an utter ruine.

In the interim the Count of Aletz, invited by those that had privately Treated with him, advances with three or four hundred Horse, within half a League of the Town, where when he understood that the arrival of Falquieres with his Souldiers, had prevented his entry into the Town, he sent a Trumpet to them, with offers of fair propositions; Falquieres could not by any means distinated, nor hinder them from sending back a Messenger again to affure him, that though they could not give him admittance at present, yet were they Masters of all the Forts; and that if the Duke of Rohan did not suddenly conclude a general peace, as he had promifed them, they would, by his affiftance, make their own in particular, not doubting but their example would allure the greatest part of the Sevenes to an imitation of them: To which the Count replied, that it was in vain to expect a General Peace; and that the Duke deluded them with that Airy fancy; but vyhil'st he made his oven, and that then he vvould leave them in the Lurch; that if they could be a means to dravy off any other co porations from the party, it would be much to the advantage of their cvvn conditions, and that they should have but a Garrison of thirty Souldiers only in their Castle, commanded by himfelf; they affured him of their zealous endeavours to effect vyhat they had promifed, and that vyithin tyvo dayes they would fend him a further answer by a Messenger of purpose: Falquieres that had seen all these Envoys, and heard the free, and lond discourses of the people to him, sent the Duke of Roham word, that unless he recruited him instantly with four hundred men at least, he should be turned out of the Town.

The importance of this unexpected newes perplexed him fo, that he took aside three or four of his Officers, in whose sidelity he reposed most considence, to impart it to them, and receive their advice thereupon; some of them at first sight conceived that the business was desperate, and irremedible, induced to this opinion by their experience in the precedent Wars, of the difaffection of that Town to the Reformed party; and that being now Mafters of the Castle, they might at their pleasure let in the Enemy; that it would be a thing of great d fficulty to fend them any Souldiers; for that the people of Anduze, that very moment expected a fiege, and had not fufficient for their own defence, would be very unwilling to part with four hundred men; that if the Duke of Roban should go in person thither, which was the best expedient for it, they would presently raise, and diffuse a report, that he had abandoned all; so that it was to be feared, least his endeavours to preferve Sauve, should prove anoccasion of the lots of Anduze; so that their advice was to fend Falquieres and his party orders to defend themselves the best they could; and to promise them a good assistance, in case the King should draw towards them; but that for preservation of their stores, he would not charge them with any more Forces, untill necessity should draw that burden upon them; others were of opinion, that the place was of fuch confequence, that the loss of

it would draw after it all the Sevenes, up to Vigan, and cut off all communication between Aaduze, and the lower Languedoe; fo that the Duke of Roban would be totally blocked up there, without any possibility of breaking through again; that the loss of it; as was that of Privas, and Saint Ambroix, would be wholly laid to his charge; and that it might be justly feared, left the people of Anduze, who were known to have inclinations seditious enough, and had store of mal gnant spirits among them, should enter into conspiracies also against him; in short, that this extremity gave them a capacity to betray him, and therefore it were better to attempt to send four hundred men to Sauve, to preserve both himself, and the Town too.

This Counsel was accepted of, and thereupon he drew out all the Garrison of Anduze, and out of it chose four hundred men, to send to the relief of Sauve; but none would undertake the conduct of them, but the Adjutant-General Randon, nor he neither; but upon condition that (to secute his own honour) the Duke would allow him the liberty to retreat with them again, in case he saw the King'r Army advance towards him; engaging himself nevertheless not to make use of it, unless enforced to it by some extremity; thus was he sain to expose his own, to save the honour of another.

Amid'st these perplexities, which were no small ones, the Court-faction in the S. vines used many subtile inventions to induce the Communalties there to a particular Treaty, excluding the Duke of Roban; the most dangerous of which, were; first, to hinder the march of the relief from Anduze to Sauve; terrifying them with continual Alarms, that a part of the King's Army was to cross the Countrey, which they would overwhelme with blood and fire, fo that not a Souldier could be perswaded to stir from his house; the next was, without his permission to convoque an Affembly, to which were fummoned only those they were sure would consent to a Deputation to the Court in the name of many of the Communalties for a particular peace; and the last was to asperse his honour, by scandalous infinuations, that Privas, and Saint Ambroix were given up by his especial order; that Blacquiere was sent to Aleiz for the like purpose; and that having made his own conditions, he would expose the resple to a necesfity of accepting such as the King should impose upon them; and in effect these, and the like defamatory rumours spread abroad, by petty, but very factious persons, that hoped by such means to raise themselves a fortune, raised a general murmur against him; for the people, (especially those of Languedoc) are naturally prone to believe the worst, of the best, and the best, of the worst PA giol fort of men; readily complying with fuch clamorous persons, as condemn the actions of other men, when as themselves do nothing at all, bur vail their hypocrisse with an indiscreet zeal, tending only to sedition, and the subversion of their Religion, and liberties.

The Duke was at the same time sollicited by often repeated Messages from the Provinces of the higher Languedoc, Foix, Montauban, and Rollergue, both for men, and money. Magaribal fends him word, that unless he were recruited with a hundred good men, and pay for them, it would be impossible for him to preserve Mazeres; and that without such a supply, or a peace-he should within one moneth be forced to quit the Countrey: Saint Michel, and the Town of Montauban, tell him, that the Prince. and the Duke d' Espernon, were drawing down to Ravage the Countrey about them, which they would inevitably ruine, unless he sent them some assistance to prevent it; but that with a thoufand men at most, and money to pay them, which they earnestly import ned him for, they made no doubt bravely to repulse them. Chavagnic, and the Town of Castres remonstrate to him, that a Famine would inevitably furprize them, unless they quickly gathered in their Harvest, which they were incapable to secure, without a Renfort of a thousand Foot, and a hundred Horse, paved for two or three moneths; and money also to muster and discharge the Forces of the Countrey; that the Duke of Ventadowr, who with his Army lay round about them, had made them offers of very advantageous conditions, in case they would incline to a particular peace, which they hitherto had refused, out of hopes of a sudden, and effectual assistance, the want of which would necessitate them to submit to such a Treaty. Millaud'also presentshim with the same doleful Note; and Alterac, Governour of the Town, plainly tells him, that without a fresh supply of Souldiers, he could no longer undertake the charge of it; and all the rest of Vabres accord in the same demands, either of men, or a Peace.

The Duke of Roham oppress with the hourely increase of such calamities, saw no other expedient for their remedy, but a General Peace, which also was attended with many difficulties; for he conceived that the King, seeing to what a low cobe the affairs of the Resormed Party were sunk, would not abate one jot of the Article touching the Fortiscations; and on the other side he very well knew, that though the people had no resolutions to stand upon, nor inclinations to prepare for a defence; yet would they never digest the demolition of their Works: If he should resolve to stand it out, and struggle with the the threatned extre-

mities, then he confidered, that if he quitted Anduze, all the Sevenes would be loft, and consequently all the Garrisons, up to the very Gates of Montauban, must submit; if he stayed there, he should draw a siege upon a place no wayes capable to sustain it; but if the King, waving that, should draw towards Sauve, the whole Countrey would come in, and every Communalty having made its peace, Anduze would be left all forlorn, and disfurnished of Souldiers to maintain it: But the urgency of their affairs obliging him suddenly to fix upon some course that had least of danger in it, he pitched upon a General Peace; which, though accompanied with never fo many difadvantages, would be yet better than an absolute diffipation of the Edicts, which would be the undoubted confequence of the particular compositions of the several Communalties; in order to which, he summoned an Asfembly of all the Communalties of the Sevenes to be held at Arduze, to diffolve that which was already convened without his permission; and at the same time sent Montredon to those that fate at la Salle, to demand a particular Peace; to let them knows that a Provincial Assembly, in order to a General Treaty, was convoqued at Anduze; and that, if they, notwithstanding his orders to the contrary, obstinately continued their Session, he had a command from the Duke to affemble the people of la Salle, to make known their refractoriness to them, and to require their asfistance for the apprehending of their persons, and carrying them away Prisoners; his perswasions, with the annexed Menaces, made them at length dissolve; for Fear is oftentimes very perswasive.

After this the Duke fent for Caudiac, a Counfellor in the Chamber of Languedoc, who had already made feveral journies to the Court, in order to a Peace, and was now but newly returned thence; where he found that their only aime, and chiefest hopes now, were, a total diffipation of the party by particular Treaties; him he desires once again to return thither, and to tell the Cardinal de Richelieu from him, that he was a faithful Subjest of the Kings, that he defired nothing more, than the Tranquillity of the State, and the Repose of his own party; and withall, that both he, and the greatest part of them, would expose themselves and fortunes to all extremities, rather than submit to any Peace, but fuch as should be General, and Conformable to. the former Edicts of pacification; that it was a thing of dangerous consequence to force an armed Party, how small soever, from all hopes of safety, but what they ground upon their despair of any; and that if the King would wouchfafe to admit of a General Treaty, and allow the General Affembly but four dayes time only to remove from Nismes to Anduze, and Pass ports for the fafe conduct of their Deputies to come, and Treat with his Commissioners; and that in the mean time all Acts of Hostility might be suspended, he was consident they should conclude a peace: Caudiac cheerfully embraced the employment, and obtains the allowance of the sour dayes, together with the desired Pass-ports, which he himself was commanded to carry back to the Assembly bly.

In the mean time every one is very follicitous to draw his own particular advantage out of this small interval: The Kings party continue their practices in the Province; but with greatest ardour profecute they the design of Sauve, whither, when Randon came with the four hundred Souldiers, the disaffected, to exasperate the others, oppress them with quartering, and that they might disgust the people with an apprehension of the Duke's undervaluing of them, quarrel at the person of Randon, as a man of too mean quality to command them; and when, according his Orders he would have mingled his Souldiers with the Inhabitants, to strengthen their Guarders in all quarters, they would by no means suffer it in the Castle, but loudly objected their priviledges against that procedure, as an infringement of them; a prevalent motive to work the populace to any thing; so that upon this ill usage of theirs, Randon, unadvisedly told them, that in case they resused him the absolute command of their Town, he had Orders from the Duke of Rohan to quit it upon the approach of the King's Army: This inconfiderate expression, so indiscreezly let fall by him, and as nimbly taken up by the disaffected of the Town, had like to have ruined all; for they published strange Coments on it to the people, crying out, that the Duke had fent them men to abandon them, when they should most stand in need of their affistance, and that defired only to possess themselves of their strength, at their cost, to purchase themselves better conditions: so that upon occasion of these jealousies they called a Council, at which they resolved, to die all, rather than admit any stranger into their Castle.

In the mid'st of their deliberations came letters from the Duke of Rohan to convoque the Provincial Assembly at Anduze, to confult upon some Articles for a general peace; which mollisted them so, that they nominated Deputies to send thither: But when the Council was dissolved, the disasted exclaim against this as a trick of the Duke of Rohan to deseat their particular Treaty, and to surprize, and detain their principal Citizens at Anduze, until they delivered up their fortresses into his hands: whereupon they thought sit to send away the next day, but one Deputy only to sound the forde, and give them notice how things were carried, that accordingly thy might be directed in their comportments; and at the same time sent they another privately to the Count d A-letz, to let him know, that the hopes they had newly received of a General Peace, made them yet defer the performance of what they promised; but yet that they suspected it for an invention only to interrupt the progresse of the Treaty they were already upon; wherefore they beseeched him to clear them in that particular, as much as possibly he could, and to believe, that in case it were not real, that Sauve should be at his disposal, of which he might assure his Majesty, and that they had received Letters from the Communalties of Gange, Sunienne, and Vigan, impowring them to treat for them also; and that though Randon were in the town, yet could they a pleasure let him into the Castle, of which they were still the Masters.

The King conceiving, upon this newes, that with much facility he might now possesse himself of the Sevenes, in all haste sent Candiac wordsthat he should come back again to him, and let alone the general Affembly where it was: This Messenger found Caudiac, and all the Assembly on their way towards Anduze, fo that much amized, they returned the same way they came, and Candiac, as little fatisfied, goes to Aletz. In the meane time Randon, and Falquieres acquaint the Duke of Rohan with the final refolutions of the people of Sauve, and the frequent Envoyes paffing between them, and the Count d' Alerz, and that unlesse seafonable preventions were applyed, the place would be certainly lost: whereupon he put his power upon the rack for a new supply of fouldiers for them; and that he might the more effectually proceed in the application of his remedies, he fent to have the wound well fearched by his Chaplain Roffell, who had been formerly Minister of that Church, and of great authority among them: As foon as he came thither, and had gotten the Common-Council of the Town together, he presented them a true state of their affaires, shewing how near they were obtaining of a general peace, if they preferved the union of the Party, which particular compositions would divide and ruine; after all which their condition would be nothing more exempt from fears or hazard; that to introduce into their Castle, a Garison of a contrary Religion, was not the way to preserve inviolate those liberties they seemed so jealous of; that it was ill done to call those strangers, who were their kinred and neighbours, and had forsaken their own Houses, Wives, and Children, to come to their relief; that to refuse the Generals Orders, and to such persons, half the Guard of their Castle, when as they allow them that of their Walls, and Gates, was a diffidence ill grounded, and probably of dangerous consequence to the Party, considering the present condition of things; that he very well knew it was publiquely reported, that the Duke of Roban's forces had not acquitted themselves of their devoir in the Towns lately taken; but that he was as certain that the contrary of it only was true; that at Privas the Inhabitants deserted the relief was sent to them; that at Saint Ambroix and Aleiz, they compelled the Garisons to capitulate; and that all the missortunes that befell those places, flowed from those who either corrupted by the contagion over all the rest; that they would do well to beware of such plagues, and for the suture to yield a greater observance to the General's Orders.

But all these Remonstrances were not sufficient to open the Castle Gates to give admittance to the strangers, which when Roffel perceived, he made a Proposition, that the people should nominate a certain number of them, the third of which should be drawn out by lot to be there upon duty every one in his turn, four and twenty houres together. The Common fort approved of this way; but the Confuls, who, disliked it, lest the Council in distaste; saying, that since they could be no longer trusted, they would discharge themselves of their Offices: But they were called back again; and before the dismission of the Council, was the Guard established. After this Rossel visits Puyredon, one of the most eminent of the Town, both for Estate, Wisdome, and Courage, and his particular friend, and one that had discovered a great affection to the Duke of Robin, whom he presses so far, that he at length got from him a confession of the whole negotiation, between the Town, and the Count d' Aletz; and upon Roffels affuring him, that if they separated not themselves from the Party,a General Peace would be soon concluded; in which should be comprised the business of Reprisals (in which he was interessed to the value of twenty thousand Crowns) Puyvedon also promised him, that, whatever were the success of the Deputy sent to the Count of Aletz, he would order things so, that there should be yet nothing altered for foure and twenty houres.

When he had dispatched with these, he found that Randon, nothing pleased with the Agreement, threatned to be gone; but when he told him, that he could not be yet besieged for four dayes, that if he would have patience but for two of them only, he should be furnished with all things he could desire, he was then better satisfied; and Rossel departed from Sauve; and meeting on the way with the Deputy that had been with the Count of

Aletz, he imparted to him the great hopes conceived of a General Peace, to which he gave no other reply than only, God grant it; but tuining his discourse to the Captain, that convoyed Rosfel, he told him, that the Duke of Rohan had too long abused them by his policies, and that he endeavoured yet to amuse them with hopes of a General Peace, but only to frustrate them from a particular Treaty; but that they were now resolved to give no further credit to him, knowing that all his talks of a General Peace was nothing but meer delusion, whereupen the Captain took him prisoner, and carried him with him to Anduze.

When Roffel came back to the Duke of Roban, he gave the Duke an account of his negotiation, telling him, that all his endravours had no other effect than only fomewhat to affwage the tumour, untill he in person should provide a better remedy for it; whereupon he immediately departed thence, and went towards Sauve: His arrival there much daunted the disaffected party; but they were now fo farre advanced, that they knew not well, how to recede from their engagements: The second Consul fled to the Castle; the Duke sent to command him thence, which summons he durst not disobey: When he was come thence, and the rest of the Council were assembled, the Duke acquainted them with the four dayes liberty he had obtained, for the adjourning of the general Assembly to Anduze; that he hoped to procure them such a peace, as should redound to their general welfare, provided, that, renouncing all diffidence and jealousies one of another, they preserved an entire unity among themselves; that he had borne armes these eight years past, upon no other design, but the defence of their Religion and Liberties; for which he had as cleare a zeal, as any of them; but that now he was to know of them, whether they would own him for their General or no, and as fuch would obey him; whereupon the people crying our, hat they would submit to him, he resumed his discourse, telling them that he would then go to the Castle, and place there fuch of the Inhabitants as he should think fit: The Consuls at first refused to follow him, pretending, that fince they were not confided in, they would quit their Offices; nevertheless when they faw him go up to the Castle, and that all the people flocked after, they stayed not long behind him, who, when he had turned out, the Guard was then in it, made choice of such a number of the Townsmen, ashe thought sufficient to keep it, obliging them by Oath to maintain it under the authority of their Consuls, and for the general good of the whole party, against all persons whatsoever; which gave great satisfaction to the people;

and when he had left in their Town a thousand men, drawn from Saint Hippolyte, Vigan, and other places, he returned the same day to Anduze.

The news of this came to Aletz as soon as Caudiac, and so netled the King's Council, that they exclaimed against the Duke of Roban for breach of promise, saying, that the King had not stirred from Aletz, butthat the Duke had been at Sauve, where he had secured, and surnished the Castle, and the Tow rs, with souldiers; nevertheless they gave him Orders to return with all speed to the Affembly, but rold him withall, that the King would not be obliged to any further stay at Alux; Caudiac, who clearly saw that all this choler flowed only from the defeat of their defign upon Sauve, replied, that the Duke had not bound himself by any engagement not to stir from Anduze, but not to make any attempt upon the Towns of the adverse Party; and that to provide for his own, could not be interpreted any breach of promise: After this he went to the Affembly, whom he found much perplexed about the Article concerning the demolition of their fortifications; for that, besides the Deputies formerly sent by them to the Affembly, the Towns of Ni mes and Ufix had fent others purpofely to oppose that Article, and, if it were possible, to draw in those of the Sevenes to fortific them in that opposition.

Whereupon it was thought fit, before they proceeded to any conclusion, that they should have the opinion of the Provincial Assembly of the Sevenes, that accordingly they might order their refolutions; But that Assembly would determine nothing in its without the advice of the Common-Council of the Town of Anduze, which they looked upon as a place the most concerned in the substitute to defend them: The Council reported their opinion to the Provincial, and the Provincial to the general Assembly; the sum of which, was, that considering the absolute necessity that lay upon them, they should choose Commissioners to Treat about a peace, and that the management of the Article concerning the fortifications, should be referred to their discretions.

The Affembly general, unwilling to undergo the whole burthen of the Treaty, affociate with them the new extraordinary Deputies of Nilmes and lifez, and a like number of the Provincial Affembly of the Sevenes, who altogether resolved to fend their Deputies to the King to demand a peace, and to moderate that Article the best they could.

The Deputies hafte away to the Court, where after feveral conferences had, they agreed on many things, but at the proposal of the aforefaid Article, the King's Commissioners would not endure the mention of any mitigation of it; but thereupon fent back the Commissioners, who reported all to the Assembly, to whom they plainly discovered that it was in vain to hope for any qualification of that Article, which seemed to be thrown in as 2 stumbling block among them; whereupon the Town of Anduze, and the Province of the Sevenes, being again consulted, they demonstrated the inevitable ruine of their Province, unless a sudden conclusion of a General Peace prevented it; for that otherwise every one was fully resolved to compound for himself apart; and that the loss of their Province would certainly draw after it that of the lower Languedoc; that the fire was now at their doors, and that they had rather submit to that Article, than fail of a Peace.

Whereupon after a full debate of the business, it was at length concluded that they should admit of that Article; and thereupon the Deputies were returned fully impowred to Treat, and conclude a peace: Which done, the Duke of Roban defired the Affembly to give their Deputies an express charge, that when they had perfeeled their Negotiation for the Publick, they should then mind his particular concernments also, which they did.

Thus was the Peace concluded at Aleiz, the 27th. day of June, in the year, 1629. The substance of the principal Articles of which, was as followeth.

15. And that all Fortifications be demolished.

The Deputies Extraordinary of Nilmes protested against this Peace, Declaring, that if they should accept of it, their Act would be difowned, and themselves killed, when they came home; and at their return, threw the blame of the whole business upon the pretended perfidy of the Duke of Rohan, and those of greatest trust about him, by whom they said they had been all fold; and having affembled the chief Officers, both Military and Civil, cause them to oblige themselves by Oath to stand it out to the last, and then sent to the Sevenes for some fresh Troops; when they had by this means drawn the Kings Army before the Town, the same persons, who were the Authors of this mutiny, to purchase themselves a reputation at the expence of their Fellow-Citizens, got themselves impowred as Commissioners to Treat for their Town, which derived no other advantage from it, than the spoiling of their Fields and Vineyards; and that which accrued to the Deputies themselves for disposing the Town, to supplicate the King to honour them with his presence.

The Fown of Vicz without any helitation at all, accepted the Peace at first; so did all Rowergue, the higher Languedoe, and Foix; nor was any place suspected to refuse it, but Montauban; where the Prince of Conde would not cease his plundering, untill the King had sent him a second Order to that purpose; and the Town it self, as the Cardinal marched that way, declared their acceptance of the General Peace.

This is an account of what passed in this last War, in which the assistance the Town of Rochelle had from England, served only to consume their provisions, and draw a Famine on the City; and the vain, and illusory hopes with which Spain, and Savoy, abused the lower Languedoc, had like to have proved the ruine of the whole Party.

God, of his infinite mercy compassionating his poor Churches, hath yet intermitted their sufferings, that by a serious repentance of our faults, and a sincere amendment of our lives; we might at length attract as many benedictions, as our sins have pulled down calamities on them.

OCCASION S.

Discourse I:

Upon the Death of Henry the Great.

I had ever cause to mix my own, with the general groanes of France, it was at the deplotable Fate of Heary the Great, suil of sad and dismal Consequences to us, but happy, as to his own particular. For though he lived inviron dwith difficulties, yet did he so surmount them all, that in the mid'st of all, he still remained a Conqueror, alwayes injoyed himself, and at length beheld the ruine of his enemies; some affected by his, others

others by their own hands, and the rest ciying out for help. Thus did their total destruction give him the opportunity to recollect the shartered pieces of this broken State, and by his Wistome and Provess, to cement and render it more strong and glorious than ever. After his coming to the Crown, he spent eight years in reducing it to his obedience, which, though full of thorny Traverles, may not impropelly be called the happiest of his life; every addition to his reputation, proving a firm Bulwark to his State. The true happiness of a magnanimous Prince confifts not in the long offession. of a great Empire, which many times ferves only to plunge him in Luxury; but, from a low and defirerate condition to raise and establish his own Throne, enlarge his Territories, and fatisfie the nobler Appetite of his Soul and Courage, rather than the fenfual suggestions of his body. Our sleeps are many times more uncasie in our beds, than in the field; nor is any repose so sweet, as that which is the purchase of danger. This was the felicity of our late King of immortal memory, who by his indefatigable cares and industry, snatched Peace, even out of the midst of perils, and to compleat his happiness, lived twelve years in a glorious possession of it, still augmenting, strengthning and embellishing his Estate, so that he became no less the dread, then wonder of his Neighbours, and Arbitrator of all Christendome: But in the height of all this greatness, without any apprehension either of fear or grief, yielded to a fate, common to many great persons: But, O Death! more worthy a Tyrant, then so sweet a Prince: Unhappy Death! though not in refert of him, yet of his people, whom he hath left to the tuition of an Infant, of nine years old; firrounded with potent Adversaries abroad, fell of Boutefeus within, and diffracted by the several Interests of the Princes and Religion. Let us justly then bewail the greatest King the world ever knew. who was good to all, injurious to no min; whose death hath bereaved France of Him, who made her terrible to her neighbours, preserved her in Peace, and Unity within her self. and enriched her with all forts of good. But from this happy condition are we fallen under the Reign of an Infant, and exposed to the Conduct of a Princess, little versed in Affaires, and opposed by the Grandees of the Kingdome, ambitious to advance themselves, during the weakness of her Government, in which, private defignes suppress the Good and publique interests. The Treasures are profused, the Arsenals embezilled, and all at the disposition of Favourites.

The comparison of the present, with our former condition, will sufficiently discover the just cause we have to deplore our Prince; so insensible are we of our good, that we never apprehend it, but by its want and absence. France, in His life time flourished with such prosperity, as twelve hundred years before could never parallel. His death hath fatally enhaunfed the price of our Repose: Whil'st he lived, the only awe of Him restrained the mischievous, whom now His death hath encouraged in their wickedness, leaving them at liberty to purfue with a full career their pernicious Machinations. The still fresh memory of his Name, retains them yet in some respect, but every succeeding day that carries us to a further distance from Him, are so many advances in the way to disobedience and rebellion. Those who have . feen the Reign of charles the ninth, with that deluge of evils that afterwards overwhelmed all France, will make an easie conjecture of her present danger. Charles the ninth came to the Crown when he was two years older than our present King, governed by the Queen his mother, a wise and politique Princess, and yet what sad effects attended his Reign > The same Factions, the same Interests, and Pretences are yet in being, though not in the same vigour: For our King Henry weakened them, yet have they now opportunity to recruite again. The power of our enemies abroad is nothing leffened, nor their Will to hurt us any thing abated. Moreover, the defects in the management of precedent Actions, are so many instructions, and profitable precepts for this present age, to direct them in the Government of theirs: Then were we Novices in the Art of sowing the feeds of discord, in which every one is become a Master. The ambitious humours of men are rather encreased, than diminished. These considerations are enough to make us fensible of the danger of the State, and ot our own loss. 'Tis neither hopes of my own particular advancement, nor fear of the ruine of the Reformed Party, that moves my tears: I too well knew how jealous the King was of persons of my Quality and Religion, and am very sensible, that we were never more confiderable, than at present: For that we have now no Princes of the blood amongst us, is an addition to our strength; for when we had them, they were not ours, but we were their support, and did their business at our costs. France was then divided by the houses of Bourbon and Lorain, but the pretence was taken from the difference of Religion; but now fince both the one, and the Bx other profess the Romish Faith; the former colour is gone, but the Division of the Popish party leaves us at liberty to adhere to which party we please: I deplore in the loss of our invincible King, that of France in general: I bewail his Person, and regret the glorious opportunity we have lost; and from the bottom of my heart, grieve at the manner of his end: Our own experience will foon inform us, how just a Subject he is for our Tears: The people murmure already, and seem to prophesie their future calamities: The Townes are guarded, as if they expected a Siege: The Nobility feek their safety amongst the most eminent of their own Order; whose factions give them large apprehensions of danger, but not the least appearance of any security. In short, he can be no true French man, whom the loss of this good Genius of France doth not even kill with Grief: Together with his person, I deplore his Courtesie and Affability, his fweet and obliging Conversation: The Honour he did me, the admittance he youchsafed me even to his most private recesses, oblige me not only to lament him, but even not to love my felf in those places, where the fight of my good Prince formerly afforded me such infinite happiness: I regret the most noble and heroick enterprize was ever yet heard of. It is not credible that the Equipage of thirty thousand foot, fix thousand horse, a Train of Artillery of fixty Gunnes, and Ammunition for fixty thousand shot, with all other furniture compleat, besides the Army then in Dauphine, and the Recruites sent to the Frontier Townes, should be designed for the siege of Julliers, which was since attempted with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse: An opportunity I shall never meet again, at least under the conduct of so great a Captain, and with so ardent a defire to serve and learn the use of Armes under his direction: An Army, fuch as no preceding King of France could ever raise; which yet, had there been occasion, he could have kept on foot ten years, without the least oppression or injury to his People. Have I not then just cause ro lament the loss of the only opportunity I ever had, to shew my-Zeal, Courage and Fidelity to my King? Seriously, each thought of it breaks my heart: One Push of Pike given in his presence, had been a greater fatisfaction to me, than win a Battle now. Much more should I value the least praise from him, in that Art, of which he was the greatest Mafter of his time, then the Elogie of all other Captaines now alive. I grieve at the manner of his deplorable death:

A Prince composed of Sweetness and Clemency, which never did condemn an Innocent to death; whose very victories were unbloody, contenting himself only to reclaim his enemies to their obedience, whom he hath afterwards cherished as his Friends, and laden them with his favours. A Prince flow to anger, and most prone to pardon, without gall or any revengefull thought, beloved and feared. And yet in the mid'st of hischief City, which he had made the Miracle of the world, attended by two hundred Gentlemen, in his Coach full of Princes and Lords, he received a fatal stab with a knife, by a man, not animated by any defire of Revenge for any difgust received, nor excited by any of his Neighbours, fearfull or emulous of his generous Defignes, but infligated only by the Writings and Sermons of the Jesuites, who after all this, blush not to call themselves French men, and can behold this dismall spectacle without inflicting on themselves the punishment due to that execrable Doctrine, taught by them, which promises Paradise to the Assassinates of Kings: Who, that ever lived under this most August Prince, as I have done, can take pleasure in these present times? I will now therefore divide my life into two parts, and call that part of it I have already past, Happy, since it was imployed in the service of Henry the Great; and that which I have yet to come unfortunate, and spend it in Lamentations, Teares, Sighs and Complaints: And out of the honour which I owe his Memory, I will devote the Remainder of my dayes (the Kingdome of God being preserved intire) to the service of France, because it was his King. dome; to the King, because he is his Sonne, and to the Queen, because she was once his dear Companion and Spouse.

DISCOURSE II. At the Assembly at Saumure.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

A Lthough this be not the first Assembly, that hath been held upon the same occasion, yet may it prove the fource from whence will flow much good or cvill to the Reformed Churches in this Kingdom. We are now happened on a Cartefour, where many wayes meet; but there is only one that leads to our fafety. The life of Henry the Great was our prefervation; which we must now expect from our own vertue. God hath taken him from us, that we might no longer place our confidence in him, whom he had given to us and all Christendome, for theirs and ours Repose: He hath deprived us of him, as unworthy the continuance of that Mercy; or else to become himself our Raiser and Defence, even when all humane helps faile us; provided that our intentions be good and holy. We must therefore come to this Assembly with a most ardent zeal to preserve the Peace of this Estate, and especially of the Church, and lay afide all Animofities, Passion and particular Interests; that with more Freedome and Alacrity, we may fet about his work, and consequently expect a blefling on our actions. What greater glory can we be ambitious of, than every man in his place, to be an instrument to support, confirm and augment his declining, weak, and almost desolated Church? to which every one ought to contribute his affistance, according to the Talent God hath lent him. We have only the use, not property of anything in this world, where we are only Ssrangers and Passengers, and not to fix our abode: This mortal is not to be prolonged but in order to an eternal life: Let us therefore be as carefull in the fervice of our God, as the wicked are in that of the Devil. Let us initate them, not in their wickedness, but in pursuing with an equal zeal the King ome of Chaift, as they do that of Sathan. Let there be only this difference feen between us, that we endeavour our prefervation by just and la full wayes, while the others use all manner of faude and treachery to undermine and ruine us. It behoves us to beware of them, it being of great concernment to us.

We must therefore fix upon three particulars, as the most effential, and on which all our other concernments depend. The first is Unity among our felves. The second, Our Admission to all manner of Offices. The third and last, to provide for our places of fecurity. Both Reason and Examples have ever taught us, that Concord is the Cement and Stay of all States and Societies, as Uiscord is the diffipation and overt'irow. Let us be therefore more exact in the practice of this Maxime than formerly, it being the very foundation of our whole Structure. And therefore have I begun with this proposition, as being of the greatest Impor-portance, and most difficult Execution, though it depend entirely upon our o. n Wills. What Encouragement will it be to jour Enemies; to refuse us that, which is in their power, when our own Divisions make so palpable a discovery of our weakness? What advantage shall we give them to break in upon us, when our own Differtions open them the Gates? And yet this hath been our constant practice hitherto. Is it not strange, that Reason, the only distinction between us and beafts, and which alone gives us light to differn between good and evil, thould fo miffead us to the preferring the riches of the world, before the advancing of the Kingdome of God: the revenging of our o'n, before his Quarrel: the vanity of being influments of mischief to our nearest Relations, before our own falvation? In shor, that Avarice, Revenge and Ambition should usurp the posfession of our souls, and exclude those vertues whose proper feat they are. Let us make our humble applications to God, that he would please to reducis these our failings, and to affift us with his Grace, that our words and promifs, which have been hitherto fraudulent and tracherous, may for the future, plove infallible pledges of our Fidelity. Let the care then of this Affambly extend to all persons; Let it receive the addresses of all particulars, and inquire also into the condition of those whose modesty will not give them leave to be importunate. Let it impartially do Justice according to the merits of their causes, that so they may have no cause to seek their Protection elsewhere. In this te as BA the strength of our bonds, for if we are remiss in this point, all will abandon us, and submit themselves to new Protectors. Let us also make an order obliging all the Provinces of this Kingdome to submit and adhere to the resolutions of the Assembly: And to this end we must establish a Council, in which all may bear a part; By this means shall we defeat the hopes of fuch as pretend to the Protection of the Churches who thrust themselves in amongst us, only to purchase their own ends at our cost. And let us hold for an undoubted Maxime, that, Nove pretends to fuch a Power. but meetly to cheat all Parties. We can acknowledge no other Protector then our King, fince he is our Soveraign, and we his Subjects, who never yet held any correspondence with the enemies of the State, but, notwithstanding all Massacres and tormenting slames, have faithfully served our Prince when he hath commanded us, and therefore with good reason may we demand, and insist upon an admission to all Offices and Dignities under him. It were a most high cruelty, that we who are members of the State, French-men born, should be excluded from that which even strangers enjoy, and that by the follicitation of those who teach, that, A mortal man cas, when he pleases, absolve Subjects from their Oath of Allegiance, and condemn our Religion for that; on the contrary, it injoynes Obedience to our Princes, though Infidels. It is not to be doubted, but that when fuch Persons have the Kings ear, we shall meet many difficulties in this Affair: But our Resolution and Unity must surmount them; for unless we obtain it, we cannot live with honour. But such is our baseness, that instead of assisting, we bend all our studies to supplant one another, and are more envious at the advancement of our brethren than our enemies. Hence comes it, that we are so ill treated as we are: Let us all' therefore see where we have failed in this particular, and refolve upon fuch a constancy as may purchase us the satisfaction we justly aim at, else shall we our selves give others cause to believe us guilty of Treason: To us will be imputed all the Murthers the Jesistes have committed on our Kings, if in their steed we bear the punishment due to them. But these considerations will be of no validity, unless we look better after our cautionary Towns then heretofore: By a fair and gentle complyance to reclaim our enemies from their malicious designes, is a good viv; but to deprive them of all means, to effect them, is a furer: Both the one and the other is feifible, provided we conjoyne them; for unless we compass the latter, the former will be of finall force. Our amity will be more fought after; when freed from the fear of our enemies, we shall be in a capacity to relieve our friends: To this end we must resolutely infift upon the Article concerning our places of Security, whose continuation is of greater concernment to us now then ever : If the late King conceived it just, how much more profitable is it now for the State during the Minority and Nonage of this, to restrain the extravagant liberty our enemies might take, even in contempt of the Royal Authority it self to rekindle that fire, and open again that iffue of blood, which our great Henry by his indefatigable pains, and with the loss of his own, hath happily quenched and stopped. The Minority of Charles the ninth, ought to be an example to warn all good people, to labour to avoid the like mischiefs; but the same example also animates all Bouteseus and Disturbers of the State to make use of their time, and the present opportunity, to execute their malicious intentions against it : We have an Interest in it, as being a part of it, if not the greatest, yet at least the best, and for whose sake, God in Mercy preserves the rest.

And now in order to those places of security, we must first endeavour the regaining those we have lost, or others in their room; that so we may cut off our enemies hopes of diminishing their number for the future: Next we must obtain a confirmation of them for a certain number of years, untill all causes of jealousies be removed, and to remedy all abuses committed in the government of them. But how shall we resolve on these things, or with what face can we demand that, which depends upon the Wills of others, when our own avarice tempts us to convert the Money designed for the preservation of the publique to our own private use, when the garrisons from whence we expect our fafety, are miraculously, transubstantiated into Lands and Moveables? Certainly this is a most deplorable condition, and so great is our Lethargie, that the examples and inconveniences of fuch miscarriages can not yet awaken us. We are just like little Children, who think themselves safe when they have thut their eyes, and are never fensible of their Errours, till made so by the punishment. In such a case Repentance avails neither the Publique, nor particular Interests.

I know these things, though Just will meet with much opposition. They will check our Presumption for asking more then we enjoyed in the late Kings Reign, and tell us, that for the preservation of the Peace, in the Infancy of this, we ought to content our solves with the like usage: To which we may answer, that it is the change of the Government that creates in us these jealousies: What priviledges in many places, have been granted to the Clergy to our prejudice > What fears have terrified us, fince the fatal parricide of our Henry the Great? the Interests of State are varyed by several Emergencies, nor can there be any certain Maxime prescribed them: That which is necessary for one King, is prejudicial to another. If a King of France should now become a Perfecutor of our Religion, he would loofe the Prorection of it in all Christendome, enriching another of his Neighbour Princes with that Title, and gaining no credit at all by it among those of the Church of Rome, would utterly ruine his own Kingdome: which cannot happen to a King of Spain upon the like occasion, for that he connet Iose the Reputation he hath not, nor can it bring any surther troubles upon his States, since in this quarrel, he hath already lost all the Low Countries, and hath no more Subjects of our Religion: I say moreover, that the situation of France, in the mid'st of many other Kingdomes, and the free exercise of our Religion in it, purchase to our Kings that Reputation and Power, they have among all other Potentates of Europe, which they will still continue, while they indulge us with the liberty of Subjects. Wherefore if the King be well confelled, he will accord us the things before mentioned; if ill, it is better to know it timely, then to expect the extremitity. Let our only aim be the glory of God, and the fecurity of those Churches, which he hath so miraculously planted and preserved in this Kingcome: Let us cordially fack the good one of another, but by lawfull means; Let us religionfly resolve to ask nothing, but what is abso-Jurely necessary for us, and be resolved in the pursuit of our demands; and then let us be affured, that he, that out of the ashes of so many Martyrs hath raised so many of his Elect in France, to glo fie him, will picserve and encicase their number daily. Honour and glo y be given to the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. Amen.

Discourse III.

Upon the State of France during the Persecutions at St. John:

T is with inexpressible grief that I begin this Discourse, with the misfortunes the deplorable death of Henry the Great hath brought upon all Christendome, and principally upon France: A Prince born in a forlorn and perfecuted Party, whom yet God raifed to be their Preserver. supported and maintained him against all the powers of Christendome, and conducted Him, as it were, by the hand, to the Government of the French Monarchy. His Actions were so many Miracles, and worthy Precedents for succeeding Ages. The Conspiracies and Troubles he broke and went thorow when he was King of Navarre, gave him a perfect knowledge of some persons whom he had never discovered as King of France. His past-necessities had taught him a generous toleration even of the hardest toyl and poverty, and to bear the discontents both of great and small; and in short, to suffer all the calamities incident to the chief of a Party in a State, where the conveniencies of a whole Kingdome were employed to his Destruction: Having vanquished all these difficulties, and conquered by his Wit and Courage that, which his Birth-right had given him a juster Title to, he became at length a Peacefull King of the most puissant and glorious Kingdome of all Christendome, which yet, by reason of its long and languishing maladies, but for his perfon, had been inconfiderable; incapable to affist their Neighbours, nay to subsist without them; but in twelve years after he came to the Crown, becomes more rich, the Townes better built, and the whole was raifed to a more flourishing condition than ever; he himself more absolute, his Treasures and Arsenals better stored, his Frontiers better fortified, his true and folid Allyes more strengthned, and his enemies more weakned weakened, then any Prince could either hope or with; In fhort, he was the Arbitrator of all Christendome, grasped the whole power of Peace and Warre in his hands; and even all the Affairs of Europe had their entire dependance upon him. In this prosperous condition did our great Heavy leave us: We were the terrour of our enemies, and the Asylum of our friends: Our France, with its Chief, was then looked on as the most considerable part of the world: But let us now reflect on our change, and confider whence it proceeds. is true, God raifes up and removes good Princes, according as his good pleasure is, either to favour, or to chastise the people of the earth, especially when by extraordinary wayes, he either fends or recalls them, which is apparent in the life and death of Henry the Great: For if his actions when living, were so highly conducing to our repose; what fears, with our just plaints may we not conceive from his violent death > A death not according to the course of nature, nor by accident, but upon a diabolical deliberation confirmed by the Sermons and Writings of the Festites, by a most im" pious A& perpetrated in the height of all his Conquests, and Magnificence; in the mid'st of his great Town of Paris, encompassed with his Nobility and People. Let us not therefore after our fins, impute our change from good to bad to any thing, but the death of our good King, whose Reputation did for some time preserve the Affairs of Europe in a pretty good estate; but the farther we remove from his Reign, the greater change shall we discover in them. Europe hath now another face; which before was ballanced by the two Powers of France and Spain: The first having without contradiction all the Prote-Stants under its Protection, or leagued with it, sharing with the other, those of the Romish Faith. Powers which cannot fuffer the one the other, and whom the strictest bonds of Marriages cannot unite, by reason of their mutual Jealousies and Fears, of the increase or diminution of either; Moreover the equality of these, is the fasety of the rest, which are much concerned in it, and which otherwise would be eafily the prey of the fuperiour of the two: But now we may perceive an alteration of that Method: The late Allyance between France and Spain makes all their Confederates look about them, especially those of France, who see clearly, that she hath been only courted but to her own, and consequently their ruine: A cunning Policy was it indeed of Spain, to perswade the Queen, that these Alliances would fortifie and confirm her Authority, so that none of the Princes of during the Persecutions at St. John.

the blood, nor any other should at any time dare to enter into any contest with her. These indeed were very plausible reafons, but of no depth, nor solidity: For against whom should she fortisse her self, but Span? and with whom, but those of a joint interest with her? and yet we practise the clean contrary, take counsel of our irreconcileable enemies, and enter into Allyances with them, to ruine our friends, or at least to lose them to our selves, while willing to save themselves, they seek their protection else where: These are the effects of the Spanish Council, or rather the operations of their double Pistols upon the Council of France: These are the fruits we are to expect from this Allyance with Spain, who joyning with the Pope, can have no other aim then the destruction of the Allyes of France, and the better part of the Nation it felf.

But let us now confider, who have been till now the Correspondents of those two great parts of Europe, their power, and who is most likely to lose by the exchange of their Partisans. France hath England, the Venetians, the States of the Lowcountries, Savoy, the Protestant Princes of Germany, the Duke of Lorrain, the Cantons of Smitzers, and the greatest part of the Imperial Townes; all equally interessed for scar of the house of Austria, which is that of spain, but for different Reasons. England is yet mindfull of the pretensions of Spain; witness the great Armado in the year 1588. and that defign of abolishing the Reformed Religion reflects principally upon that Kingdome. Venice is jealous of her Neighbour Mlin, and of the increase of the King of Spains Power in Italy; for that undoubtedly his defign is to render himself the absolute Monarch of it all. The Low Countries have but newly shook off the yoak of his Tyranny; they hate and fear Him; and will rather hazard all than submit again to it. There's none that is not sensible of the sweetness of liberty, and what then will not a people do to continue themselves in the possession of that, hath been their own dear purchase. The Protestant Princes of Germany have they not just cause to sear, and even abhor the house Austria, and by all means to oppose the farther progress of their ambition, fince it hath robbed them of the Empire, which they have almost entailed on their Familie? the broad way to flavery into which they are now declining, and nothing but an extream diligence can prevent their fall. The Centons of the Switzers, who for the greatest part have slipt their necks also out of the Austrian yoak, are not they concerned to prevent his new couquest of them? especially those of our Religion, against whom can neither want Pretences nor Affistances from Rome.

The Dukes of Savoy and Lorain are seated so near to France; that though they have for a long time past embraced the Spanish Party, yet now they seem to incline to France: The former by reason of his pretensions to the Duchy of Millane, promised to his Lady in Partage: And the second for the sacility for a King of France to ruine him at his pleasure: There remain only the Imperial Townes of Germany, whose Interest is the same with the other Protestant Princes, I omit Denmark, Sweden, Polonia, and the other more remote States, for that their Interests are not conjoynt with ours.

The Spanish Party confists of the Emperour, the Arch Duke Albert, who are of the same house: of the German Princes of the Romish Belief, and the Imperial Townes of the same profesfion, by reason of their mis-intelligence with the Protestants: of all the Princes of Italy, whom fear rather than love affociates with them; of the Populh Cantons of the Switzers invited by their Pensions to a conjunction with them; and of the Authority of the Pope, who while with a resolute constancy maintaining our Allyances, we shew our invincible power, keeps himfelf as Netter, though his inclinations be wholly Spanish. For there are two things that exasperate him against us the loss of his Authority, and his revenew in those places which we possess: which Jealousie the King of Spain foments that so feeding him with the fancy of a spiritual Monarchy over all Christendome himself, under pretence of extirpating Herefies, might gain the temporal. Thus all their defignes concenter, to work our destruction.

But let us now examine these two great powers, and see whether of them is the more considerable: France is a large and potent Kingdom, abounding in all necessaries; rich in Nobility, good Souldiers, and good Mariners, surnished with good Ports, aptly seated to receive the Supplies of their above named friends. England, Scotland and Ireland make up a powerfull State; being Nations naturally valiant, both by Sea and Land, stull of Souldiers and good Ships, and able to raise and entertain a gallant Army. The state of Venice exceeds in strength all the other states of Italy; hath vass Treasure, and may justly assume the Title of Master of the Sea, there being no other power in Italy, nay not all the rest together that can equal it for the number of good Gallyes, and other Vessels. The Low Countries is a State, whose strength I infinitely esteem and admire; fourty years have they maintained War against the King of Spain, from which they are but newly freed: they have the flower of good Officers and Souldiers, whose entertainment they continue, even in tim's of Peace, they are well flor'd with money, and keep an Aimy on foot, conlitting of fifteen tho if and foot, and three thousand ho se, and a Train ready to march upon all occasions. As for the Sea, they are without contradiction the absolute Masters of it, to that they can, when they please, aid their friends, and obstruct the relief of their enemies; witness the Army of the Prince of Parma against the English, which they stopped in their havens, and other Maritime places of the Arch Duke, which during that War, were continually blocked up by Sea. As for the Protestant Princes of Gamany, and the Imperial To-ns, every one knowes how to their force exceeds that of the Rumanits: And for the Similaris, money commands them at any time. There remains only the Dukes of Savor and Lorain; they are Princes, especially the former, able to raise considerable numbers: As for their convenience to assist on the other, a map of Europe will plainly discover, that no other power can obstruct it.

is a great Kingdome, not well peopled, nor over fertile, seated in a corner of the world, and fitter to maintain, than inlarge its confines; invironed with the Sea and the Pyrenean hills; which of it felf alone is not comparable to France; but it hath large Territories both in the East and est Indies, whence it derives great Treasures, which puffe it up with ambition of the Monarchy of Christendome. Mo cover in Italy it hath the Kingdomes of Naples and Sicily, with the Duchy of Millan, and eight or nine Provinces in Flanders; for though the Infanta have them now in Purtage, yet hath it the fole and absolute authority and disposition of them. Serously the Dominions of Spain are of a vast extent, and were they all contiguous, would far transcend the Power of Fra.c : But it is necessitated to spend all the Revenews of Naples, Skily and Millar in Garrisons and Armyes to preserve them, and to imploy all the profit of the Indies for the conferration of Flanders, by reason of the continual expences it is imployed tothere, both for the transporting and paying of these Armyes: Besides, the King of Spain wants men, and hath need of Spaniards in more places then he can furnish with them, and

frort of his power, hath a great enemy to struggle with, viz. the Tuik, whom he cannot withstand without assistance, and therefore is he very incapable to relieve others. The Arch-Duke is comprehended under the power of Spain, and neither dares, nor can attempt any thing without its confene and supplies. The Germane Princes and the Imperial Towns which own the Romillo Church, are very inconsiderable, being far interiour to the others in strength. Nor are the Princes of Italy of any confideration, except the great Duke of Tufcany, who indeed wants neither men nor money: As for the Switzers, money draws them to any party; nor is the Spaniard confederated, but with the Romish Contons, whereas the Allyance of the French with them is General. There remains now only the Power of the Pope, which heretofore, in times of Ignorance and superstition, was very great, hisexcommunications routing whole Armies, and transferring Crowns from one head to another, at his pleasure; but they are now growen ridiculous, and hurt only those that are afraid of them; his strength consists only in Fulminations, As for the wayes Spain hath to convey relief to its feveral members, they are very long, and full of difficulties and dangers: For first; France separates Spain and Flanders; and Province can at any time obstruct the passage from thence into Italy; Burgundy, Bressia, Lorain, and the Venetian Seigneury divides the rest of Italy from Germany and the Low Countries : In a word, the Dominions of Spain are of a vast and wonderfull extent, and in outward appearance invincible; but they Iye so scattered and with such difficulty and inconvenience can they joyn, that it takes off much of their strength; whereas on the contrary those of France, are compacted, united, and ready upon all occasions either for defence of themselves, or invasion of their enemies.

These are the two principal Petentates of Europe, to wit, France and Spain, and it is of no small importance to them, both to preserve their reputation with their Partisars, which is of no great distinctly to the King of Spain; for that all his Subjects and Allyes are of his own Religion, or his own Family, or obliged by interest to exterminate the Protestants. So that none of them can entertain a Jealousie that he should change his Intelligences; But 'tis not so with the King of France, for he himself prosesses the Romish Religion, and hath many Subjects of the Reformed, and many consederates that are Papists, though the strength of his Party consists in the Protestants: so that if he order not well his Affairs.

Affairs with them, but entring into an affociation with Spain, perfecutes his Protestant Subjects, he will utterly lose them all. But perhaps they presume upon a considence, that the Reformed party cannot joyn with the King of Spain: But rather then they will submit to their ruine, they may unite and choose the King of England for their Protectour, which would be the absolute destruction of France: And can we then be so far instruated, as to offer up our selves a sacrifice to the insatiable and endless ambition of the Pupe, and the King of Spain? Is it not evident, that this must needs draw a civill War on France, which is more to be seared than the sulminations of the Pupe; who since he cannot ruine France by forraign Armes, endear our to be it by her own.

Certainly it is the Judgement of God, punishing us for our fins, that we cannot fee, apprehend, nor feek to avoid those evils, which even our own Counfels, resolutions & remedies prescribed for their redress have discovered to us for forty years together, and which have reduced our poor France to extremities, from which nothing but a miracle can raise her. The same parties are still in being: The first, the Queen-Mother, who seeks to establish her authority in the same manner, as did her Predecessour; and to that end, difgraces and suppresses the Princes of the blood; using the power and affiftance of the house of Gwif, to which is joyned that of Monsteur a' Espernon; strengthens her self, not with the real friends of the Crown, but with such as aim and endeayour to weaken it by divisions, as the King of Spain, and the Pop?. This is a strong and considerable Party; but composed of persons that desire rather the destruction, than preservation of the State: That which is their greatest Prop is ; that they abuse the royal Authority, authenticating all their dipatches and actions with the name of Lowis the thirteenth, although to his prejudice and detriment: The second, is composed of the Princes of the blood; who are sensible of the ruine of their House, but are not in a capacity to prevent or remedy it; having by their revolt from their Religion, lost those who were their Father's greatest support, so that they have Justice, but no force on their side. The third party, is that of the Religion, bound by their conscience to a confederacy with all the Protestants of Christendome: a party able of it self to maintain France, as it hath formerly done: having preserved the Princes of that house, nourished and bred up Henry the Great, the Restorer of this State, whose enemies knowing that the strength of this Party consists in its Union, Discipline and Places of security, have set all their fubtleties on work to fubvert those foundations; which evidently appeared appeared in the Assembly at Saumure, where money, Pensions and Menaces were all employed to corrupt Persons capable to raise a Schisin amongst them, and in that division to ruine them; As also by the Pass-port given to the Deputies of the particular Assemblies, by the Declaration which they caused to be verified in the Parliaments, in which they expresly forbid the Discipline ever establisht among us, and without which we cannot provide for our necessities: by the induftry they use to get into their hands our cautionary Townes; working on the easiness of some of our Governours, and furnithing other confidents of their own with means to purchase the Governments from honest men; endeavouring, to the violation of the Priviledges of particular Corporations, to make their own creatures Majors, and labouring by all means to Supplant and eject out their commands such as oppose their defignes, well knowing that our places of fecurity once failing us, we can no longer subsist: and in all these designes so pernicious and destructive to the State, is the King's Authority made use of. Thus have you had a view of the several Parties in France, what are their defignes, and by whom maintained. The one covers all their mischievous machinations with the Royal Authorities: The other exclaims against the evil Government, but it is not heard: The third complaines of their oppression, but are not cased: and even untill this present time such effectual operation hath their money had upon the degenerous and perfidious fouls of the two latter parties, that they have been the fcorn and derision the former; and the Counsels of mean inconsiderable Fellows, Pensioners of Rome and Sp.in, preferred before those of the Princes of the blood, and the other Grandees of the Realm: But if the aforesaid Princes, and those of the Religion would but reflect upon their miscarriages, and endeayour to correct them, and unite their just plaints and interests, and like good Christians, never be induced by any promise to forsake the one the other, to the prejudice of either, they would undoubtedly raise both themselves and the State from this abject and ruinous condition, and would one day receive both the thanks and profit of it : But if fear or avarice, or both together, shall impede the union of these two parties, or keep them from embracing such generous and necessary resolutions, this will be the issue of it, and God grant it prove no Prophesie; France will be the Theatre on which will be executed all the defignes both of Rome and Sp. un , uron all good French-men and Christians. And when the

the Evil shall transcend all humane Remedy, those who have yet lett some sparks of love to God and their Countrey, will have no other consolation than to bewail their past errors, and to submit to that yoak which their own imprudence hath drawn, and a Forraigner shall impose upon them. For we may not imagine, that that party, which by the affiftance of the Popes Fulminations, and the Forces of the King of Spain, shall subdue the other two, shall enjoy its Conquest: These Princes take not so much paines for our good. Their conspiracies against France are so far from being extinct, that they are now renewed with greater vigour and hopes of every thing succeeding according to their with: The restoring of the Jesuites, the death of Henry the Great, the Regency of the Kingdome setled in the house of Medicis, the State governed by the ancient Pensioners of Rome, all other Officers being removed, and the support of it founded on the house of Loraine; the Princes of the blood deprived of the Authority due unto them; and a division made among the Protestants; all which evils being in so short time fallen upon this State, encourages their hopes of effecting their long fince projected defignes. But if the Princes of the blood, during the minority of Lewis the thirteenth, retain any Reliques of Generosity, or those of the reformed Religion any sparks of Piety, they will yet oppose the ruine of the State threatned by theirs: For France cannot long subsist, if the Royal Family be opprest, and the Protestants persecuted: whose subsistence also depends upon the preservation of the Crown, whose destruction can neither be effected, but that the Kingdome will be reduced to so weak a condition, that it will remain a prey to the first Usurper, or be brought to an intire desolation: Let these considerations then teach us Wisdome, before an absolute impossibility to redress our evils, leave us no confolation but despair: for not having timely foreseen and prevented them.

And now, you Princes, know, that Usurpers never willingly let goe what they posses; that your greatest crime, is the right you have to the Government of France, and that nothing but the sear of you can restore you to what their contempt hath deprived you of: And you, who profess the Reformed Religion, recall to your remembrance, by what means your Fore-Fathers planted the Gospel of Christ in this Kingdome, and the provisions they made both for your security and discipline: Shall we be guilty of so much baseness, as to prefer the empty promises of some pension, which shall no longer be continued, then while you betray your own Countrey, or of some small Estates, which after the ruine of your friends, you shall not enjoy, but by the sacrifices of your own consciences and Religion, before our own and our Childrens liberty, and the prosperity of the Church of God > If then the Princes be defirous to maintain the Crown in their own Family, and the Protestants in the State, they must enter into a firm Union to maintain and support the one the other. Let us imploy all our powers to restore them to their lost Authority; ler them make use of theirs, to confirm our Rights, Disciplines and Correspondencies: and let us all joyn, to re-establish the ancient Allyancy of the Crown. I fee how they calumniate these of the Religion, pretending that their aim is in imitation of the Smitzers, and those of the Low-Countries, by a particular Discipline to disunite themselves from the State. But neither their dispersed, and remote habitations in this Realm, nor the great number of Nobility amongst them, nor the sence of the honour of their Nation, nor yet their own profit, will fuffer any of them to admit of such a thought.

God in his Mercy look in pity upon this declining State; and I heartily befeech him, that if his pleasure be to restore, and preserve it, that the body of the Resourced Religion may be its chief Support; but if in Judgement, he restolve upon the ruine of it; that he would yet vouchsafe to replant his Churches, by the same means he first planted them here. Amen.

DISCOURSE IV.

Upon the Voyage of the King, in July 1615.

T Conceive my self obliged, both by my Allegiance, and the I services I have vowed to the Queen, freely to offer my advice concerning the present, many, and important Affairs of the State; which ought to be the more confidered, for that it proceedes neither from hatred, nor defire of revenge against any; nor fear of being rejected, nor hope of being advanced to a share in the administration of them: Passions which many times blind the greatest persons; The freeness of my humour, and the Integrity of my affection drew me to this Discourse; which will clearly discover both my Opinion and Resolution. I confess, that as to the Affairs now in Agitation, I cannot clearly see, that the former actions of the Prince of conde can bring his Fidelity or good Conduct into question. Nevertheless I will take all things at the worst, as if all the expedients heretofore made use of were defective, it being a known Truth, That the miscarriages we smart for, serve to correct and quickenus, whereas Prosperity lulls us into a careless Security.

Untill the Affembling of the States General, all the Subjects and Officers of the Kingdome kept themselves within the limits of their Duty, reflecting at the same time, both on the favours and damages they might receive; and choosing rather to content themselves with their present condition, than out of hopes of a reformation to expose all to a hazard. But at the Assem. blyof the said States, the disagreement of the orders upon the propofition of the third Estate, made by the Parliament of Paris; the instant urging of the Council of Trent by the two first Orders, and the malice the Clergy have discovered against those of our Religion, refusing to approve of our Edicts of Pacification, endeavouring to oblige the King by Oath to ruine us, have opened a large gap for those who attempt to diminish the Queens to inlarge their own Authority.

Next

Next came the Revocation of the Polette, which made the Officers, when it was not feafonable, be changed; whose re-establishment will not reconcile them: for though it be that which troubles them, yet will they conceal the ground of their discontents, cloaking their particular interests with the pretext of the publique good. But there is yet more, the Deputies of the faid Estates, going thither for the most part, not to pursue the general Welfare of the Kingdome, but to do their own private Affairs, having wholly complyed with the pleasure of the Queen, conceive her obliged to return them large Rewards: To that those which received not that Recompence, they supposed they had so well deserved, return to their respective Provinces, exclaiming against the Government of the State: fo that this, being added to the number already ingaged against her, will be far the strongest. All these things having been with great care and subtilty aggravated by the Prince and his Partifans, have gained a great reputation to their defign, even among forraign Princes, and the best Allyes of the Crown of France, whom they perswade, that there is a Confederacy between the Queen the Pope, and the King of Spain, to extirpate all of our Religion out of all Christendome; which all good Frenchmen are obliged to oppose: for that it would prove a great weakness to France, and all leagued with it against the greatness of Spain.

This is the true flute of our Affairs, in which, either the Prince must give back, or the Queen yield a little, or else all must break out into an open division.

If the confideration of his private interests inclines the Prince to a complyance, it will be the absolute establishment of the Authority of the Queen, wherefore I cannot conceive he will yet

Liften to any fuch motion.

But let us now see, whether will be of greatest advantage to the Queen, that she perish in her Resolutions, though all fall into a consusion, or that she yield a little to the necessities of the times, and afterwards resume her former power againe, and what inconveniences will attend both the one and the other resolution. If she submit and retard the marriage, or change any Officers of the State, or the Exchequer, it is probable that the Prince will reap all the thanks and prost of it, that it will be the enlargement of his, and the destruction of the Queen's power, and by consequence the contempt of the one, will be the only effect of the glory of the other. If they proceed in the marriage, and continue things in their present present condition, then may they sear the troubles which the Prince, the Parliament, and people of Paris may raise in their absence, not only in that Town, but all over France; I he distrusts and jealousies of the forraign Princes, allyed with this Crown; whose own Interests render them very suspicious of this league between France and Spain. The War with Savoy, and our dereliction of that Prince would be looked on, as an argument, that the end of our amity with Spain, was their prejudice and dammage; and the apprehensions of those of our Religion, that the whole storm will fall on us: Wherestore I conceive they cannot without the extream hazard of the Queen's authority, begin the voyage before they have provided Remedies for all these inconveniencies.

If they conclude upon the voyage, then my advice is, that in any case they resolve upon four things. The first is, that they have a power in Paris, either in the hands of one person qualified for that charge, and to be affissed with a Council, or else in the hands of the Parliament, to maintain a constant correspondence with the Queen; and to prevent all insurrections of the people. The second is, to make a peace with Savoy, or at least not to discover our weakness and disaffection, in expressly forbidding the sending any Relief to that Duke; it being not in our power to prevent it. The third is, by entring into an Allyance with England, to satisfie all other our Consederates, who are so jealous of this League with Spain. The south is, by a good and savourable usage of our Assembly, publickly to testific to the Protestants, that they are also studious of their preservation.

This is my first advice; but I conceive there is another more profitable, and more secure, if well examined, and free from all fear of creating new divisions: which is this, That the Queen let the Prince know, that having considered the Remonstances of the Parliament, she will make all possible provisions for their satisfaction: before she begin her progress into Guienne, and that to the end, she desires his Assistance, in reforming and redressing the grievances of the State: If he come not, it will be the Queen's Advantage; who must not fail also to treat with the Parliament about the same thing; For what good foever shall accrue thence, will no more be attributed to the Prince, fince he contributed nothing to it. But in this Unity, the Parliament must upon any terms be satisfied, especially concerning the administration of the Finunces, and this must also be readily, and without any reluctancy granted: For when a man condescends to things against his Will he must not discover his aversion, but rather pretend a ready inclination to it. If this be minaged as it ought, and by persons that only respect the Queen's authority, within fix moneths it will be more absolute than ever, and the Prince his confpiracy utt.rly broken; Believeit, there is strength enough in France to support the Queen, without borrowing aid from any place : I will use but one example to confirm it, which is, the War of the Commonweal against King Lowis the eleventh, who destroyed that great League by no other means, but dividing it; though at trefe it feemed to threaten the destruction of his Authority. of you cannot find means out of their particular Interests to diffinite the Princes, you must try another way: If the Parleament be close fifted, as they now feem to guard their purse. they must be attempted in their weaker quarters, which they do not at all suspect: you must blow them up with the vanity of affifting the Queen, and re-uniting the divided State. In the mean time the King growes on, and his authority increases with his age, which will augment the power of the Oucen, and diminish that of the Princes of the Llood. But the must be very cautious, that the apparent diminution of some particulars bring not a hazard on that Authority which maintains them, which once imputed, would be the ruine of them all.

As for my part, I am resolved saithfully to serve the Queen against Monssew the Prince, to imploy all my power to advance the Grandeur of this Kingdome; and in as much as lies in me, to incline all those of the Reformed Religion to the same resolutions: But if out of any animositic they have against the Protestants, or by the procurement of evill Counsel, they use them as at Samuere: I will then declare, that I will never differat nor distinite from the publique resolutions.

DISCOURSE V.

Upon the Government of the Queen-Mother.

Made in the year 1617.

"Hat Rhetorick which touches not the Interests of those we . would perfwade, hath seldome any operation upon them: Nor had the letter which Monsieur de Vendosm3de Mayenne and de Bouillon writ unto the King against the Marshall d' Ancre, nor the Declaration published in his Majesties Name in anfwer to it, a neat and well composed piece, hitherto any effectual influence upon any, either to incline them to embrace the discontented Princes Party, or to gain their intire approbation of the present Government: For the prodigious favour of the Marshall d' Ancre, was both suspected and abhorred: and they who were filent at it, were either in effect, or by fome hopes linked to his fortune: And truly, there was never yet any Precedent of a man honoured with the Dignity of Marshall of France, that ever served in an Army, nor of a man, that all at once was intrusted with the tuition of Seals and Purse of the King; that is to say, that grasped his whole Authority: Nor is it less strange, that those whom the late King imployed to discharge those offices, should be now discarded. Though the Chancellour hath been faulty since, yet the Integrity of Monsieur the President Du Vair, and his abilities are unblemishable, and yet could not those parts which advanced him, secure him from disgrace. To maintain also that the Edicts of Pacification, and all Promises made to particular Communalties have been hitherto inviolably observed, would be but a vain Discourse to those that know the contrary: that is, almost to This little draught of a complaint, contains in it the summe of the most importance charges against the Marshall de Ancre, and the present Government, Where-

Whereupon some say, it were to be defired, not that the Marshall d' Ancre should be ruined; for his birth is equal to any that in our memory hath been created, not only Marshall, but Duke and Peer of France; and hath raised a Family in this Kingdome; and his Wit and Education, and many other qualities, make him thought worthy of this favour, and to be naturalized to perpetuate his Family amongst us; which would be a great honour to our Nation: But it is to be defired, say they, that this greatness give no just cause of suspition to those who are jealous of the Royal Authority, and the French Monarchy; and that untill the perfect Majority of our King, the power should not be ingroffed by a Single Person, who may more casily abuse it than many, who preserving the State from the unjust usurpation of either, will assist one the other in managing and referving it for him alone, to whom the Rule of it rightly belongs, untill he himself be able to undertake the administration of it. For no man can tell, untill he hath proved it, how far the Itch of Soveraignty may carry, nor can this Tryal be made by any person whatsoever, without mainfest danger both to the King and Kingdome. It is also to be defired, that the ancient Pilots of the State, resume the helm again; that the Edicts of pacification be faithfully observed; and that those abuses, which have a long time raigned amongst us, be reformed; whose visible increase threatens much mischief to this Monarchy. But whether we look upon their Intentions or manner of their procedures, we shall deceive our felves, if we think those expedients, which the discontented Princes have formerly, and now still do use, are capable to effect this Reformation: Their two Treaties of St. Menchould and Loudun will clearly convince all those who shall examine the particular passages of them, that their greatest aim hath been their own private Interests, and that they had a greater defire to ingage many persons to promote their own advancement, and favour their own particular designes, than to reform the State, as they pretended, or better the condition of those, whom their folicitations had drawn to a conjunction with them: For though they promifed us a general restauration of all things by the convention of the States Gencral, they cannot deny, but that they openly made their Parties in the Provinces, to procure the Election of such as they supposed to be of their own faction: Thus did they violate the liberty they promised to restore, and give a Precedent to the Oucen-Mothers Disciples to do the like. And though

though fince that, to make their own cause appear more plausible to the people, they have publickly accused many, and principally the Mareshall d'Ancre; yet did some of them, and especially of the Resormed Religion, maintain a ftrict intelligence with the faid Marshall d' Ancre in the hottest of the War. Thus at St. Menebould and Loudun did they conclude upon conditions, regarding only their own concernments; never moving any thing that really conduced to the advancement of the publique good. Nor hath the defects of their duty to the State been greater, than their Injuries to those of the Religion; whom yet Monsieur the Prince was pleased in his Letter to the Queen to mention as persons concerned. And though that at the Treaty of St. Merchould the Dukes of Mayne and Bouillon, nated by the Prince, to treat with her Majesties Commissioners were earnestly sollicited by Monsieur de Rohan, who fent a Secretary of his own in post to them, to desire them to make it appear, that they had summoned them in good earnest, and with intention to procure their Welfare; yet was the Treaty concluded without any benefit to them, or indeed without any mention made of them. They figned alfo that at Loudun, refusing to expect the resolution of the general Assembly then held at Rochel; though they had entred into a solemn engagement, not to do it without the mutual confent and Approbation of all parties. But this was not all: for they obliged themselves by a formal promise under their hands, by violence to force the Deputies of that Affembly, if they did not diffolve themselves within a very short time which they prescribed them; which Promise Monsieur de Trimoiuille and de Bouillon signed as well as the rest; which Monfieur de Plessis-Bellay, Monsieur de Trimouill's Deputy, confessed to the Duke of Rohan in the said Assembly at Rochell; to whom also, together with Monsieur de Sully, he presented it to be signed by them, which they both abfolutely refused to do. And when at several times many Romanists have reproached the Prince for coming so easily to an accord; his answer still was, that the fear of advancing the Reformed Party forced him to it. Nor did Monsieur de Nevers excuse his refusal to joyne with him in the late commotions, but by this, that those of the Religion were of the Party: And Monsieur de Mayne hath alwayes protested, nay at the time of their affociation, that he would never procure any good to them; and yet when they conceive they may be usefull to them, as at present, they want neither promises, vowes, nor protestations to engage.

These are some Arguments that the principal end of these Princes is not the general good of Frazee, much less of the Reformed Party, and God grant that we have not now a just cause to sear, as hitherto (if they arrive at their purpose) an absolute translation of the French Diadem: The mildest cenfures that shall view their actions, cannot but say, that the remedies they prepare, are worfer than the disease, I will not fay the Plague and poison of the State. For since they pretend nothing but the restoring of the King's Authority, and the Welfare of the people; is there any thing that so much prejudice either the one or the other, as the Armies which have alwayes appeared as foon as their letters and declarations? Can any thing so easily raze out of Subjects hearts, the Reverence due to their Princes, as the accustoming them to bear Arms against them? For although these Gentlemen will not confess that they raise Armes against the King; yet when mention is made of the King's Party, they understand it of the adverse party to them, for so is the Kings Army called; which I do not alledge as the formal reason of the Justice or Injustice of either cause; but only to shew, that unless a great extremity exact it, such things ought not to be permitted to the people, which may many waies impair their reverence of the Royal Majesty, that Reverence, I say, which is the only Basis, and most firm foundation of it. And as for the people which condemn the prefent Government, whose errors cannot bring on them in twenty years, fo many and heavy inconveniencies, as a Civil War will in ten dayes, since it is yet disputable in whose hands the State is lest liable to danger, either in the Queen-Mothers, or the Princes; what reason is there to expose it to an apparent ruine for a thing, which may be probably argued, both by the one fide and the other.

Certainly, if their power were so great, and the consent of the people in savour of them so unanimous, that the execution would presently sollow the pretention of their designes, we should be constrained to endure it: But they are only capable to provoke and stir the humours, not to expell them; to make a wound, and not to heal it; to open a way for a forraign Invasion, never caring how to redeem the Nation again; thus do they draw upon themselves the maledictions and curses of the people, for the evils they have caused them, and have not the least power to do them any good. To this purpose remarkable is the decree of the Council extorted from them; the last year by Monsseyr the Prince, who was then President of it, which by all those that paid Contribution in the time of the late troubles, were injoyned to pay it over once more; not without the great amazement of those that affished at the same Council, though they had no other Interest in the business than what Equity, and a natural Commiseration of their Fellow Subjects gave them: But if these Princes were in possession of the Government, the same complaints might be exhibited against those, that would disposses them of it, and perswade them to patience, until the King should have a perfect knowledge of his own affairs, whose management he would be obliged to look after, as his chiefest Exercise. And good reason also should we have to complain, if we were compelled to bear Arms: but the choice is now left us, either to do it, or so stay at home; though Commissions are daily resused, and that these Lords proclaim all enemies that come not in to them.

That which is before faid may give the French cause to fear the Contagion of fuch Reformers, and to remember, that there was never yet any War raifed in France, under pretence of the publick good, whose principal aim was not the particular Interest of those that begun it. But especially ought the Protestants to be carefull to stick to their priviledges given them by the Edicts made in favour of them; to have a watchfull eye upon their cautionary places, and to unite themselves more strictly than ever under the name and authority of the King; to whom in this posture, they may be one day capable to render very confiderable fervices, and poffibly to preserve his Crown: But if they adhere again to those, who have formerly deceived them, and who defire their Affistance for no other end, than to promote their own affairs, they will absolutely lose and ruine themselves: In the mean time, let us leave the event to God, and inceffantly implore him for the preservation, prosperity and long life of the King, the good of the State, and the firm establishment of the Crown. Amen.

Discourse VI.

Made in the year 1617.

A free Discourse upon the present Times.

Tvery well know, that the general humour of Mankind inclines them to defire what they have not, and to discribe them and flight what they posses. In the time of Henry the Great, every one complained of an avaritious and oppressive Government; but none doth stir against it: since his death we have seen those grievances redressed by liberality: But forassimuch as the number of those who receive no profit by it, far exceeds the other, and that Envy is a vice very common and predominant: The former Reign hath been again wished for: The large gifts and pensions conferred on the great Ones, encouraging them rather to transsers, than contain themselves within the limits of their Duty. And now we murmure, that the only means left to restrain every one, are imployed to that end.

Revolving these so different things in my mind, I have reflected on the changes which have happened, and confidered the former miscarriages, their causes, and the wayes to redress, and prevent them for the future. The courage of Henry the Great, his Authority, his suppressing the Grandees of the Kingdome, his abounding Treasures, and well stored Arsenals, rendred him so redoubtable, that none durst think of disturbing his Repose. His suddain death subjected us to a King of nine years old; and although the Regency without any opposition fell into the hands of the Queen-Mother, yet was it not without a great disgust to the Princes of the blood who pretended to it. The Councils then most prevalent, were by the power of others of the Nobility, to with stand that Authority, which themselves ambitioned in the Court; and to maintain these two powers in so equal a ballance, that in the mid'it of both, the royal Authority (pofsessed by the Queen) might freely exercise its functions, to abase the discontents of either, by a profusion of the Treasures, Arsenals, Offices and Governments. As for the first, I must needs approve it to be as good, as I must confess the latter to be bad : For though our Malady by those means be suppressed for ten years; yet will it prove in the end almost incurable. It is a most certain truth, that in all Kingdomes the Power of the King eclipses that of the Nobility, and that the increase of theirs, doth diminish the splendor of It is a ballance that can never continue in fo equal a poife, but that one fide must sway the other. therefore but an ill way to preserve the Royal Authority, to put into the hands of those that endeavour to destroy it, the only means to restrain their ambition. How much more easie was it to have kept the Princes in subjection in that weak and necessitious way, I dare say, beggerly condition in which the late King left them, than now, when we have parted with all our forces to strengthen them with them? It may be well faid, that a Kingdome is better fecured by Love than Tyranny; but then this love must not proceed from imbecility and want of Power, which only breeds contempt; but must be testified by a constant pursuite of Justice, and earnest endeavours to preserve the people from oppression: It is a dictate of nature, that we avoid all inconveniences, and apply our felves to those that are sollicitous for our good. I must include my self in the same accusations, if I should extend this charge against all the Nobility, who are fo much more the fittest Instruments to be imployed by the King, as they have the greatest means to do him service. I know that those, who are of a well tempered spirit, look upon their own as the greatness of their King. And more happy, and fecure are the Nobility, under a great and potent Prince, than under those petty Soveraigns, who dare not flir for fear of offending either France or Spain. But I speak of fuch as would inforce their Majesties to gratifie them, though they have no merit to justific their pretences; and who also wayes imploy their goods, gotten by unjust wayes, only to augment their own greatness. Certainly the more you give to fuch persons, the more do you arm them against your self. It were much better to resolve to distinguish between Reward and Punishment; the good and the bad; to the end that the one may be encouraged, the other terrified, than still to persist in the practice of the Contrary, rewarding the bad, and discountenancing the good: For Impunity opens a door to all licentiousness and ingratitude, and neglect of good services.

The opinion I have of this Counsel, makes me suspect that the Authors of it, gave it only to make themselves the longer looked on, as necessary to the service of the Kingdome; and that their own private Interest, a powerfull Orator, disswaded them from giving such Counsels as really conduced to the preservation of the Royal Authority, in that splendor they found it in.

And now I am entring on a way which gives me fair hopes of an happy accommodation of the Affairs of this State; which must be pursued with as much vigour and courage, as the disficulty, and consequently the honour of the Enterprize require. So firm a resolution must we take, as neither their exclamations, nor any other Artifice they shall use to daunt us, may not divert us from our purposes, what ever accidents happen; which possibly may be such, as that to remedy them, we may be forced sometimes to defer, but must never give off our design. For perseverance joyned with the royal Authority, will easily subvert all their policyes, especially at such a time, wherein that vertue is not to be found in many. I consess, that such a Resolution is not to be undertaken, but upon good grounds; wherefore we will particularly examine the State of our France, and diligently consider all things in it:

And first, I observe, that there are two Religions prosessed in this Kingdome; the one much superiour in strength, and which gives the Law to the other, and would gladly be alone: The other alwayes jealous of an Assault, whose ruine will nevertheless draw after it that of the State also: Henry the Great, who was of that opinion, gave an equal influence of his favour to them both, and would not prejudice his own greatness to gratifie the humour of either.

The strength of a Kingdome depends upon the King, and his Allyes, not of blood, but interest. France and Spain are the two great Powers of Europe, and the hinges on which all the other move, who still oppose one another, lest either should gain the absolute Superiority. The Interest of the Protestants, is to uphold the greatness of France, and so is it also of many other States which profess the Romssh Faith: It is a Maxime of State, which the King of France ought to ob-observe; not to persecute his Subjects of the Religion, that all Protestants may not throw themselves upon the Protestion of England: yet must not the sayour he shows them be such, as may raise a jealousie in his other Subjects the Catholiques, which are the main body of his State; but he must oblige them by his Justice, preserving inviolate their Edicts, and by his considence in imploying them in his service. None but the Enemies of his Crown can disallow of such a Procedure.

From the Religions, I pass to the discontents, who are fill very numerous, for that the mind of man is unftable, prefumptuous and envious, and is many times more troubled at the wealth and honour which another possesses, than that he enjoyes it not himself. But it is according to the strength or weakness of the State, that they discover themselves more or less. Those who now declare against the Royal Authority, whether of the one, or the other Religion, exclaime against the Government, becasse it is nor in their own hands; accusing their Majesties, if not of Treachery, yet of Folly; and fuffering themselves to be led by the fancies of other men, they fall upon the stone, not daring to touch the arm that threw it, and cover as much as they can the pernicious design they have, to usurp the Royal Authority, and make themselves Masters even of their Majesties theinselves. Those also that serve the King, for the most part, follow their own, not his pleasure. Every one will command an Army and a Province; and if his Neighbour, or one of the same rank with himself have any Command given him, and he not; he prefently is discontented, and dares think even of trampling upon the throat of his Mafter: Certainly if they had all their defires, we should see Monsters instead of Armies, more Commanders than Souldiers. I confess such disorders are not tolerable, and that such persons are almost as much enemies of the King, as those that are convicted of Treason. Others make their consciences plead for them, and remonstrate, that it were better for the good of all Christendome to satisfie the Catholiques, by making War upon the Reformed Party: Counsel tending to the Eternizing of a Civil War in France, and the loss of its most faithfull and powerfull Allyes.

Those of the Religion, that engage in these broils, alledge, that they will not stop at the ruine of the Princes they now decry; but that if we stop not their progress, we shall have our share of the persecution: The King's Council proceeds from Rome and Spain, one of which incessantly seeks our particular destruction; the other, that of France in general; which is clearly discernable by the inobservances of our Edicts: and though they move different wayes, and for different Interests, yet all the discontents of either Religion, unanimously accord in their desires of a change of the present Government.

And now to come to the Remedies, which by reason of the diversity of humours, cannot easily be particularized; we must know that there are two forts of Discontents; the open, and the concealed; the former cannot be reduced to their obedience by any other means then force: The other are a fort of people that declare for no Party, but would render themselves considerable by a third: These may much imcommode the Kings Assaires, by such Diversions as they can make both with the men, and money they can raise; to these nevertheless must be applyed gentle Lenitives, and not those harsher Corrolives of force,

All expedients necessary for the good of this State, may be reduced to four heads. The first, and main particular is, to force the Princes, now in Armes against him, to an obedience to the King: to this the way is open; and the best policy is, to use no other, but only to be very carefull to keep good Armies on fort, to make a good choice of those that are imployed in them, and to make good provisions for the Payment and Sustenance of the Souldiers. The second consists in general, in the Execution of our Edicts, and in particular, in being carefull to free us from those inconveniencies and jealousies that have been, and still are given us. Which may be done by a just payment of our Garrisons and Ministers, and by a sincere effecting of that, which in words they confess, is necessary for us : and by fending Commissioners into the Provinces, and keeping a constant Correspondence with the Principal of them. which may produce more good than is imagined. The third is, a wary and politique comportment towards all those, that declaring for no party, can yet raife great commotions in the Provinces, as the Dukes d' Espernon, de Sully, d' Lesdigueres, can by means as different, as their ends. A several Remedy must be prepared for each of these, who must be also made sensible of their dis-union, every one labouring to make conditions with the Court apart. Monsieur d' Espernage cannot away with the present Government, because he is excluded from the helm: He aimes at the Government of Guyenne, and to be made connestable of France; which fince he cannot obtaine by fair, he would by foul means. He professes much zeal to the King's fervice, controulles the Catholiques, pretends to be an enemy to the Prince, the Duke of Boilidon, and all other the discontents: and yet doth he defire the Government of the the King; will live amongst the Protestants, and will deliver the Prince, and the rest. I leave it to all to judge, whether either the one, or the other, can fix any confidence on a man so mutable. If Guyenne be given him, it is the way for him to make himself connestable : after which he will become a Tyrant over the King and Kingdome; as he is already over those that live under his Government. See what his dealings are: at the fame time, that he vowes all Loyalty to the King, he promifes his uttermost service to Madome the Princels, for the deliverance of Mmsieur the Prince, and maintains a correspondence with all the other Princes in Armes: As for Monsieur de Sully, he is wholly inclined to the good of the State: He is weary of the hard measure he receives, desirous to have his services better regarded, and vexed at the neglect of them: but will never be drawn to oppose the Authority of the King, untill he beforced by the greatest extremities. As for Monsieur the Marshal Lesaigueres, he hath great commands in his Government, is wife, and one that would be confidered as a person of Power and Authority: but is not at all unreasonable in any thing. The first of these is the hardest to be contented; for that, Humility swels his Pride; Gentleness makes him more Violent, and Toleration emboldens him; yet must be amused with fair words, untill the taking of Soissons; for the issue of that siege, will make all the pretended third Party change their note. The second, by an indifferent and moderate usage, may not be only restrained, but employed where he is, to retain by his power the Protestants within their due limits: And the last may also by the same means be infallibly kept within his: His age, his Antipathy against the Dukes of Boilillon, and d' Espernon, and the ill usage he hath had from the Prince his party, are prevalent motives to keep him to his Devoir. If these wayes should fail, the King hath yet Peace, and War in his own hand, which he may make with either of them, when he pleases, and severally too For all the Princes now in Arms against him, would joyne with him to suppress Monsieur d' Espernon, or any other, that should be so Fool-hardy as to oppose him. All of thein, as many as they are, must needs fight with great D 3 disadvantage, having no Chief that they will own; being in a continual diffidence one of another, purfuing the advancement of their feveral particular Interests, and the destruction of the Kings, who can at pleasure disunite them, by tendring conditions to either of them, when he shall see his time. There remains nov the last expedient, and that is, to foment their mutual Jealousics, and render them odious both to their own and forraign Nations; which must be done by a particular Demonstration of their design, ever fince the death of the late King, to embroil the whole Nation for their own private profit; by discovering also their Confederacyes, Treasons, and their fallacious Pretensions, how they have cheated those of the Religion; how one Parry complyed, to make its Peace at the others cost; how that in all their Treasies they have not discovered the least thought of the publick Welfare; What submissions they have all made to him against whom they just before so loudly exclaimed; What fidelity they have sworn him; how faithfull they have been to him, that the world may know what spirit leads them; and that Hatred and Ambition, and not the Love of their Countrey, or the King's fervice hath alwayes absolutely governed them: If the first expedient be well followed, and the other three not neglected, I shall fee the King most absolute, the Civil Wars all ended, and a fair way opened to the Glory, and Grandeur of the King and Kingdome.

DISCOURSE VII.

Upon the Occasion of the Divisions of Holland, 1618.

Tates and Common-wealths are not formed in an Instant, and the Lawes which they make to redrefs their prefent inconveniences, are ordinarily better than those which regard the future: which is a great cause of their multiplicity and change of Lawes from time to time, for that they are obliged to apply convenient Remedies to survening evils, before they grow incurable : I speake this principally in relation to the State of the Low-countries, who in a fourty years War, which they sustained against the power of Spain, are so augmented, strengthned and established by that glorious toil, and become so absolute Masters of all Military Arts, that they inforced the King to a Peace. But though during the War, they knew how to establish all necessary Lawes in order to the profecution of it; yet have they shewed themselves but Novices in their Conduct since the Peace, or to speake more properly, they must confess that the Government of their State hath need of some new Expedients to prevent those mischiefs which threaten it now.

The King of Spiin finding by the experience of that long tract of years, that he could not ruine them by open force, resolved to work their destruction by intestine Divisions. To which end the calm of Peace and Idleness, which many times lulls such persons, as think no harm themselves, into a security, have given him occasion to rowse those unquiet spirits, whom either Discontent, Envy or Ambition, will not faffer to rest satisfied with their condition. Other Divisions than those of Religion, would have been suspected; and for as much as that is the most advantageous proceeding from a Subject which hath the absolute Dominion over others, he designed to undermine them that way: which may be justified by the Writings and Counsels given these ten years past, and upon the same point which are still controversed;

In which he hath so successfully laboured, that we see that fair State, which the force of Arms could not move, is now finking to ruine, unless some speedy support prevent it: which I conceive yet feifeable, if they firmly adhere to, and pursue their resolutions. All the Assemblies which they have had till now, whether particular or general, have been to little purpose; for as much as the constitution of the Government of that State is such, that the particular Provinces will not fubmit to the determinations of the States General; nor yet the particular Townes to those of their own Province; for that they pretend, that their Republick is composed of as many Soveraignties, as Townes; and that they have till this present time sublisted so; for that till this present they nover met with any confiderable accident to disturb that order; but were still kept united by the necessity of their own prefervation. But now the malady is fuch, that they will never find any remedy for it in this order, which really was utterly unknown to former ages. Is it possible that the obstinacy of some members, should destroy the whole body, or that the body should be so weak, as to be unable to govern them > To speak freely, it seems to me a great Argument of Self-Love and Presumption, to put so high a value on our opinions, as to facrifice the publick Peace, and hazard the ruine of the State we live in, to purchase them a reputation.

To redress this, I conceive they must take this course, to wit, to endeavour to compose the divisions in Holland concerning Religion, by an Assembly of Holland only, if it may be done; that so as near as possible they may observe their ancient Order; and also to use the same procedure in the other Provinces, and to pacific them by the same Expedient.

But if this fail, they must of necessity have recourse to a National synod, which though some particular Townes refuse to send in their Deputies, they must proceed in, and submit the Resolutions of it to the Council of the States General; which in so important an Affair, must defire their Neighbours, and good Allyes to affist them, by their Embassadours, with their good advice; by this means will they be engaged also to consum and maintain their decrees, which they must communicate to them, as also to all their Townes and Souldiers; and I am consident, this course will reclaim most of those that have hitherto differed, especially if they observe moderation in the decrees they make.

Next

Next I conceive that the States ought to endeavour to reduce to their obedience, those that perfist in their obstinacy; and, if God give them grace to compass that defign, they will extrast much good out of these evils.

As for the Symol, it will be necessary, that they establish a Discipline for the Church, that for the suture every particular person, may not at pleasure fly from it; which must be also so limited and restrained, that it may not in any wise increach upon the authority of the States; which may be easily effected, by forbidding all Symods and Ecclesiastique Assimbles, not to intermeddle with any thing, but what concerns Religion only; and that no such Assimbles be held, unless some secular Magistrates be also assistant there, and privy to their consultations.

They would do well also to ordain, that for the suture no Minister should be admitted to any cure, that maintained any Doctrines condemned by the Synod: and that for the prefent, those that preach, should be enjoyed, not to touch in their Sermons, upon any points in Controversic. But above all, must they endeavour to bring them all to the same Communion: for as concerning that particular, which is the soundation of our Salvation, and of infinite Efficacy to unite us; there is not any diversity of opinions, as I can learn.

Discourse VIII.

Reasons of the Peace made before Montpellier in the year 1622.

HE just regret I have to see my good intentions daily aspersed and calumniated, obliges me, both for my own honour, and to undeceive the credulous, to defend the most just of my actions, and most profitable to those of my Religion, to wit, the procuring of the general Peace of this Kingdome: In which I hope clearly to demonstrate the necessity of concluding it, and that in it I have used all the precautions could be defired to obtain it from our victo ious and puissant. King. But before I enter upon this Discourse, I must observe that my greatest Censures were such, as with folded Armes were only Spectators of the War, and who under favour of a Declaration, continued in a peaceable Enjoyment of their Estates, while we hazarded our lives to secure their repose: and that among those, the most violent of my Detractors, are fuch, as being themselves corrupted by the Court, upon false hopes diverted the good affections of such as were inclined to affift us, continually posting up and down to deprive us of the Succours we expected. Envy is a vice base in it self, and yet too well known amongst men. But leaving the only cause of the War, which their unbridled ambition raised, and which their revolts could not appeale, they now cast the blame on those who admitted nothing to prevent it, whom no hopes of Profit drew into that Engagement, fince they lost all they had; nor yet any thirst of glory, fince they east themselves upon a Party that was bought and sold; but only among other god'y men, to find a harpy death dying for Chift, or an unexpected deliverance, which they could not hope but from the hand of God alone.

It will be impertinent for me to name him that so unseassonably convened the General Assembly, and when convened,

incon-

upon the Peace made before Montpellier. 41

incouraged them to continue their Session, and then betrayed them; and who, after he had made his own peace with the Court, animated the Town of Rochelle against the Aslembly: For it is well known who was then the Deputy General.

It is also needless to say, that the Interess of Monsieur de la Force, and the sollicitations of Monsieur de Castilloz, were very prevalent to make the said Assembly renounce all thoughts of dissolving. For their Agents and Parisifans have sufficiently discovered that they alone impeded their dissolution: And yet the former persevered not to the end; but shuffled up a Peace by himself, and the other during the War, covertly did use what mischief he could; and openly, when the other way succeeded not: and yet had we all solemnly sworn by our Deputies, not to hearken to any particular Treaty, nor to make any peace, without the consent of the general Assembly.

Though by their Conduct, both of them have arrived at the honour to be made Marshals of Frazee, and that by mine: I have lost my Governments, yet shall I not envy their good Fortune; but confess they are more prudent than I am. My purpose in this is not to accuse any one; but only by the force of Truth to repell those saults they impute to me, and evidently to discover the necessity of making that peace: having not omitted any thing from the beginning to the end of the War, that might conduce to the advantage of that Party, which I desired to support. For our War being nothing but a just desence of the liberty of our consciences, and the security of our persons under the favour of our Edicts of Pacification, granted us by our Kings, we were obliged to embrace all occasions might induce the King to grant us a peace.

The first Overture was at the Siege before Montauban, where the English Embassadour extraordinary came thither for that purpose, sent his Secretary several times to me, to sollicit me to it, whom I presently remitted to the Assembly General; at length he pressed me so with the apprehension of the loss of Montauban, that I consented to an interview with the Connessadour that the Connessadour with the Montauban, made him froster, not to include in the Peace, neither Montauban nor Rosselle, unless they would submit to have a Citadel built in their Townes,

Having thus broken with him upon the first point, which concerned a general Peace; and the difficulties of taking Montauban encreasing by reason of the relief I had put into it, the connestable invites me to a second conference, which I refused , but he still urged the renewing of the Treaty; whereupon I demanded permission to send to the Assembly General for their consent, to treat, and conclude a Peace; which I obtained, but the connestable dyed presently upon it; and those that were engaged in the Affairs, joyned with Monfieur the Prince, who was now come to the King, and fo changed the whole defign of the Peace, that instead of arproving the power, the Assembly had given me to treat of it. and which I had defired of them, they impute it as a Crime to me, as if I aimed to make my felf chief of the Party.

This opportunity thus frustrated, and seeing I had now the power of the General Assembly in my own hands, I began another Treaty, but with greater confidence of success then before, with Monsteur de Lesdiguieres, now Connestable of France, and commissionated by the King to treat with me : we met; and agreed upon most of the particulars in debate, but remitted the entire conclusion of it to the King, to whom I, and all the Provinces under my Command, fent our Deputies: And at the same time did the Connestable and I send Deputies also to the Duke of Boillion, Sully, and Trimouille. and to the Marshall de la Force, as also to the General As-Cembly, and to my Brother, that they might also send their Deputies to the King, from whom they were to expect the final conclusion of the Treaty; informing them withal, that our Deputies had no other Commission, but to consult with them about those Expedients which they should think necessary for the publick Good, and the satisfaction of each parti-

Monsteur the Prince, who unwillingly saw the progress of this Affair, haftens the departure of the King, that by the absence of the Chancellonr, and the President fann, who remained still at Paris; he might the more easily break the Treaty; and leads him towards Poicton, where the Exploits of my Brother had given them a found Alarm: But our Deputies could not come near the King, till after the Rout ar Riez, the Treason of the Baron de St. Surin at Royen. and the overture of the particular Treaty with Monsicur de la Force, which absolutely deseated the General, and made the King refolve to dismiss our Deputies, without ever admitting

mitting them to his presence, and to pursue his designes in Languados, whither the hopes he had given him by Marsicus de chastillon invited him.

After fo many Difasters that crossed our intentions, the King marches into Gwenne, and there concludes the Treaty with Monsseur de La Force, and others of that Countrey; and having no fears in any other part of his whole Kingdome, but in Languedos, he draws thither all his Forces. In the mean time I omit no Care, Diligence nor Industry, to raise the dejected hearts, and to compose the dis-united Members of our party there. For the approach of fuch a Tempest shook the constancy of the most hardy; And as the greatness of the danger diversly affected the spirits of them all; and their zeal to the publick yielded to their own particular apprehensions, so were the factions in our Communalties renewed again; and where I was abfent, there were the fairest offers made: In the mean while I posted from one Province to another, according as their necessities required: nor did I neglect the overtures made of forraign affistance: For I gave my servants power to engage all my Estate, to bear my proportion of the charges of the Levye and Conduct of fuch supplies; and obliged the Provinces under my Command to do the like. I furnished Montpellier with a pretty good quantity of Wheat, notwithstanding the ravage that Mossieur de Mostmorency had made there: And, without vanity may I fay it, had it not been for me, there had been neither Mills to grind it; nor Powder, nor Match, nor any other necessaries for a siege: And had they hearkened to me, Lund, Maugir, Marfeilliargues, and Hymargues had been dismantled six moneths before me; and Montpelher, Nismes, usez and Sommieres for the convenience of the Sevenes, been well fortified. And we should then have had men enough to make a brave relistance: But the Imprudence of the people, and the particular Interests of Governours of those places made them deaf to my advice, which they have fince, but too late repented.

It cannot be imputed to me, that the eight Regiments defigned for Montpellier, could not get in as well as that of St. Cosme, and some others; for all the Colonells received their Commissions, and Pay at the same time: Nor was it my fault, if, that after the failing of these Colonels, twelve hundred men of the Sevenes got not in neither, since their Commander in Chief had received my Orders for it, and after the Souldiers resused to follow him, went in with sisteen men only, without any hazara or difficulty.

And now was Montpellier befieged, where I conceive I did as much as lay in the power of man to do, for the fortifying and floring it with Souldless, and all manner of provisions in five weeks flay, that I made there; And befides did I imploy all my engeavours and interests to raise four thousand Men more to receive them, before that the Connessable and the Duke of Vendoya were joyned with the King's Army; but in vain, for it was impossible for me to draw any together, but upon conditions made by the greatest part of them, not to thut them up in Montpellier.

I have by experience found, that there is a great difference between popular refolutions, and the execution of them. For Nilmes, which had by letters affared Montpellier, that they would supply them with a thousand armed men from their own Town, would allow me but fourty two; But it is not Enough to raise Troupes, but there must be care also taken for their subfishence. From the Sevenes I could not get any Corn, it being no Countrey for it, and had not then enough for themselves. As for Nismes, which was our only Granary, they grumbled at the propositions I made for any, and would afford me no more than for eight dayes only. within which time they injoyned me also to fend in the relief to Montpellier; and yet had I eight Leagues to murch with it, and with two hundred horse might any Copyoy, I could send, have been eafily cut off. All the Commonaities were tempted to particular Treaties: that of the Sevenes importuned me to make a Peace, and plainly told me, that they would not suffer themselves to be ruined: All our people were weary of the War, and unable to continue it: There was not Forrage enough left to keep the Cavalry for fix dayes, which confifted but of two hundred Volunteers; which I must either dismiss, or send them into the higher Languedoc, and confequently lofe them: The hopes of the arrival of Manifeld were gone with him into Holland, which was a great prejudice to us: For the Army defigned for his Convoy, was now upon their march towards the King, and were already come as far as Zon. The King of England inflantly urged me by Letters (in any cose) to make a Peace, and to fabrit to, and wholly relye upon the promifes of my own Soveraign; prefling me morrover to confider the Affairs of his Son in Law, and afforing me, that he could not roffibly give us ary affiftance: To which I add, that without a Miracle, Assipellier could not have been relieved with any Troops

upon the Peace made before Montpellier. 45

Troops able to preferve it; for that it was so full of Traytours within, that being obliged to draw off to a greater distance from them, I had two thousand horse in the rear of me for three leagues rogether.

And now let all unprejudicated persons judge of the necesfities that oblige me to make a general Peace, and whether it was possible for me to insist too much upon niceties, without an absolute ruine of it. For I must upon a certain day hazard the supplies, which was the same thing as to expose them to flaughter: or I must see the disbanding of my Troops, the demolition of half our Fortifications, and the King's Entry only into Montpeller, without which conditions I could not possibly obtain a general Peace: But all the precautions that a weak and vanquished party could require of a strong and triumphantenemy, or a Subject could demand of a King, I have procured; and fuch, as if those of Montp llier would have unanimously accepted, they had been now in Liberty: For besides the Patent they had from the King in terms clear and free from all ambiguity, Monsseur de Cherreuse, and Monsieur the Marshall de Crequi were delivered up to be kept hostages, and to be committed to some place of Safety, while the King stayed at Monipellier; whereupon fome of the Town told me, that they would not receive them: for that his Majesty could at pleasure seize upon their Inhabitants, to release them; and that they conceived their presence would be more advantageous to them than their absence.

As to the second particular, I answer, that it is a most strange thing, that my open and professed enemies should omit this occasion of calumniating me, and that those that are of the same Religion with me, should endeavour to make the world believe that, which the actions of our enemies so clearly refute: for the crasts and violences practiced by Mossieur de Vallence in Montpellier for the space of a whole year, to force them to renounce that Patent, and consent to the raising of a Citadel, had been needless, if there had been any particular agreement derogatory to that Patent, made with me before.

There remains now the third, as abfurd as the other; to which I answer; that the Souldiers being at my disposing, who constituted such Officers over them, as I pleased, my Authority in Montpellier had been much greater, had I abandoned the publick Interest, to purchase my self more advantageous conditions than I have done; The most severe of my Cen-

fairers and Detractors must confess that the Peace was necesfairy and good, had it been observed; and that it was not in my power to change any thing in the Edict, nor can they justly impute it to me, that it is not so well observed now, as in the late King's time.

But they further accuse me for neglecting to take such securities as were requisite for us; and that I refused to retain Montpellier, only to necessitate them to accept of the Peace I had made; that the Patent given under the King's hand was but a delution, and that I had before made other Articles with the King, by which the garrison was to be perpequally continued there, that I had caused Lurel, Manger, Ma lilleargues and Sommieres to fland out only to amuse, and loofe the Soulders, purposely to disfurnish Montpellier of them; which things if they were true, they might justly condemn me for the most treacherous and indifcreet person amongst us; that being not the way to obtain conditions tolerable for the publick, or any particular Interest. But besides what I have already faid, I will yet shew, that their accusations have not the least appearance of Truth; for if the insufficiency of the security accepted by me, be objected as my only Crime, I answer; that to the last, I withstood the two particulars that concerned it most, to wit, the demolition of our new fortifications, and the Kings Entry into our Townes: But seeing, that the retarding of the Peace, caused a daily decay of our Affairs, I was forced, to do what lay in me, to prevent their utter ruine.

I shall not waste any more time in resuting this Reproach; Phat my care to secure my own particular Interest made me negligent of the publick; for that the whole course of my life, and even this last action of the Peace, doth sufficiently evidence the contrary; having yet no Indemnity as to my Governments; for which I have not shewn my self more follicitous, than for our publick Concernments. But it is no wonder to me, that these, who durst not adventure any thing for the defence of our Religion, should make their own the Rule to judge of the dispositions of others by. My actisons fince the conclusion of Peace, must needs appear to those who will vouchsafe them an impartial consideration, as fo many Arguments of my Sincerity: I have spared no pan to procure the Confirmation and Establishment of our Articles. I have suffered imprisonment, and have boldly repre-Tented to the King, how highly he doth prejudice both his honour and his fervice, in fuffering these Infractions of the Peace: But neither the perfecutions of our Adversaries, nor the Calumnies of our own party thall ever divert me from the firm resolution God hath given me, to devote my self entirely to the promoting of his fervice.

And now I summon all my critical Observators and Detractors, to show me a better way than I have taken; and promise them, that I will second them, better than they have affished me; and that, laying aside all remembrance of former Actions, I will with a free and cheerfull heart embrace the cause of God, and repute it my greatest glory to suffer for his Names sake.

Discourse IX.

An Apologie of the Duke of Rohan concerning the late Troubles in France.

TIs an ingratefull Imployment to serve the publick, especially a party weak of it self, and composed only of Voluntaries: for if any one sails of his proposed ends, they all exclaim against those that had the Conduct of them. This I have very lately experienced; being condemned by the people, for that their grievances have not met with such redresses as they expected, and that by the instigution of salse Brethren, who to purchase themselves an esteem with the adverse party, are emulously industrious to brand me with their own just Character, as also by our pretended Pacifiques, who in a zeasous tone, deploring our miseries, and cast the blame on such, as according to their report, by their participation have ruined our Affairs. I willingly excuse the ignorant people, who sensible only of their Afflictions, judge of things rather by the event than reason, and lay hold on that that lyes next before them, like bruit beafts, that only bite the thaft, never reflecting on the arm that darted it: But I cannot pardon men of reason, and persons versed in the affairs of the world, who continually fee that the best contrived defignes are not infallibly fuccesfull, and that the hoodefs do not alwayes miscarry: Rochille alone, to my great grief, furnisheth us with a notable example to this purpose. first Siege was presently after the Massacre, and dissipation of the whole party, being then weak in fortifications, reduced to the last gasp, and abandoned by all: which obliged Massieur de la Noke, a man emment in Piety, Prudence and Valour to perswade them by a timely submission to prevent an utter desolation: yet was it delivered from that imminent. destruction, by means of the Polish Embassadours, who came to demand him for their King, who had then brought it to fuch extremity. At the second stege it was in a very considerable condition, very well foreified, and strengthened with Confederates both within, and without the Kingdome, and at such a time as favoured them with great hopes of better diversions, and yet did we then see it lost: which should teach us not to judge rashly of any enterprises, either by their good or bad faccefs, much less to condemn them, unless we have good reasons to justifie the Censure; otherwise shall we shew our felves more envious of anothers glory, than zealous for the publick good. Yet could I have born those detractions, had they only reflected upon my Imprduence and Incapacity: and should have only reproached the Authors of them, for not taking my place, and endeavouring by their own actions to correct the errours of mine. But I cannot pass over in filence their other accusation, that to gratifie my own ambition, I had exposed the Protestant Churches in France to ruine, and that, to fill up the meafure of my iniquities, I had delivered them up into the hands of their enemies, to fatishe my avarice: these are the objections I intend to an. Twen, that the world may judge who hath been more carefull of them, those who by an open abandoning, or secret oppugning them, have preserved, and augmented their Eflates by the acquificion of fair Offices; or those, who to support them, have resolutely beheld and sustained the confiscation of their goods, the demolicion of their houses, the loss of their Governments, the indignation of their King, the differsion of their nearest kindred, and banishment from their native Countrey.

To understand this affair aright, we must know, that the fource of all our evils, was the ATembly Generall at Rochelle, convened by the Sieur de Favas, then our Deputy Generall. His pretence was the redreffing of the affairs of Bewn, which then lay desperate and past all hopes of Remedy: But the true occasion of it, was the deriall he had of the Government of Lectour, thinking by this means to make himself considerable, and sought after, for his own benefit: But, as it is easier to put a man upon a precipice, then to withdraw him; fo, with much leffe difficulty inight this A Jemb'y be formed then diffolved; I forefaw the inconveniencies of it, and endeavoured to prevent their meeting, and to dissolve them when assembled, for which I was aspersed, as corrupted by the Court. But it is well known to every one, who was the occasion of their continuance. Had ambition only then governed me, and animated me to make my self Chief of a Party then very confiderable, and at fuch a time, when I had not yet experienced the perplaxities that attended the attempt; I should not have lost fo fair an opportunity to shew my courage amongst those Zealots, whose flashly zeal expired as soon as they had arrived at their ends.

Thus am i clearly innocent of the greatest fault committed in the management of our affairs: This obstinacy of the Assembly drew the King upon us, every one submits, and gives him up our Cautionary places: and all from Summer to Mortauban, yield without any opposition, except St. John d' Angely, which my Brother defended as well as he could, To describe the various events of that Warre is not proper for this place. But at length a peace was made before Mongellier, in which there were comprized no other Generals of any Provinces besides my Brother, and my self; all the rest having before made their compositions apart with large rewards added to their Indempnities: Yet was I then, as now calumniated, as the only betrayer of the Party. But time, and the continued violences I have suffered since the conclusion of the peace, have pretty well silenced those more injurious rumours.

Come we now to the second Warre: The ground of which was a totall infraction of all the Articles of the Peace; especially the not disgarrisonning of Montvellier, and Fort Lewis, and detaining the debts owing to particular persons, which made them all despair of their condition. As for me, my own private assists obliged me to endeavour a continuance of the peace; For, being by the savour of Monsieur the Chancellour de Silvery, and Monsieur de Pursieux eased of my oppressions, I had gotten some assignations to recompence the losse of my Governments: But that, which was the most urgent motive to this Warre, were the publique preparations made at Elavet, for the blocking up of Rschelle, which made its addresses to me; My Brother also came himfelf to impart to me the defign he had, to divert the storme that threatned it. Lapproved his resolution, which he prepares to execute with the hazaid of his Life and Fortunes, uron this condition, that in case he prospered, I should assist; if he failed, I should d'sown him. I know not many of our Cen. farers would have runne the like adventure. The treachery of fome of the Religion encreased the peril of the enterprize; and was the reason that it was but half effected: Nevertheleffe, he feized on all the Shippes, and made himfelf Mafter of the Sea, together with the Isles of Re and Ole of, overwhelming all that opposed him, untill the French Fleet was re-inforced by the conjunction of the Eagl (h and Hollander with them: Whereupon we demanded a peace, which we obtained; and, though it were not so advantageous as we could defire, yet was it better than the former; forasmach as all our Fortifications were to remain entire; and that the King of England, by the King's confent, became Caution for the observance of it: who was also promised that Fort-Lewis should within a little time be razed.

Let us now reflect upon the third Warre, and confider who were the Authors of it. The revolts and treacheries I had experienced in the two former, made me unwilling enough to runne my filf into a new engagement; and, none indeed, that had not proved it, could well judge of the heavinefle of fuch a burthen. Not, but that i fix that the loffe of Roth-lle would necessarily follow the continuation of the peace, without fome extraordinary affiftance; Neverthelefle, conceiving the evil irremedible by us, I addrefled my supplications to God, for its deliverance; conceiving it a sufficient satisfaction to my Conscience, that I had something advanced the condition of our Churches by the precedent peace, and cast the care of the execution of it upon the shoulders of a Potent Kiag, who could not with safety be disobliged, and who only was able to undertake the preservation of Rochille.

Whiles I was in this resolution, came a Gentleman to me from the King of great Britain; to let me know, that, being surety for our peace, he was equally sensible of our sufferings, to which he would apply all convenient Remedies; that the preparations made against it, assured him of our enemies intentions to ruin Rochelle, not with standing their engagement to the contrary; Wherefore, he resolved to affish them to the uttermost, and that he was now making provision for that purpose:

pole: That, in the mean while he would follicite our King, by his Embashadours, to perform his promises in our behalf; and that, though he had little hores to prevail, yet he conceived himfelf bound to try all gentle wayes, before e used any extremities: which if he were forced unto, he would hazard all his Kingdomes, and his own perfortoo, in so just a Warie, to which he found himself obliged both by Conscience, and Honour: provided, that for our parts, we should take Armes with him, and promife, as he did, not to liften to any Treaty, but joynt'y with him; That he would entertain his Armies, both at Land and Sca, at his own Charges, untill the end of the Warre; That he had no other aime, than the observation of the peace, for which he was engaged; conjuring me not to abandon my Party, when so just, necessary, and apparent opportunity for its Restauration, was offered. Protesting withall, that if he would not hearken to this offer, that he should hold himself discharged of his engagement, both before God and Man. And for conclufion, defired me with all speed, to dispatch a Gentleman to him, with an account of mine, and the refolutions of all our Provinces.

And here I demand of my Detractors what was to be done in this case. If I should absolutely refuse this offer, and that the King of England after the taking of Kochelle, should declare, that it was my fault alone that it was not relieved, in what predicament hid I then been? Had I not been in execration with all those of my Religion? What cause had I then given them to condemn me? And here I challenge every particular person of my Accusers to make my case his own, and to consider, whether I could in conscience be deaf to such Propositions. On the other side, I considered to what a heavy burthen, I now a third time submitted my shoulders; calling to minde the inconstancy of our people, the Insidelities of the better fort of them; the poverty of the Villagers, the avarice of the Citizens, and above all, the irreligion of them all.

All which, were sufficient to shake a more resolute spirit than mine. Neverthelesse, hoping that God, who had been ever my desence, would not now forsake me; I was blind to all other Interests, then that of his Church; and extolling his Piety, and generous Resolution, answered the King's Proposals, with a promise, to take armes, as soon as his Army should make their descent into the Isle of ké, and not before; for that our people would need such a Spurr to quicken them: and that, according to his desires, I would within a sew dayes send a Gentleman to him, with most humble thanks for this offered assistance, and to satisse him in all points he defired to be informed. The, now dead Sie is de Saint Blowcast, was he whom I employed: After which, came my Lord Montague with Credentials, to confirm all that is above related.

The English Army landed in the Island, and a little after I appeared in armes: It was not my fault that that Army took not the citadelt of Ré; nor that the second victualled not Rochelle; nor that the third did not rescue it from ruin. For as for me, I had continually two or three Armies upon me, which I still held in play, and which was all the diversion could be expected from me; and God so strengthened me, that notwithstanding our wants and weaknesse, they got no advantage on me.

But there is yet another aspersion layed upon me, for that, feeing Rochells was loft, and the King engaged in the Relief of Cazil, I let flip that opportunity, to defire a peace; To which I answer, That there was then a Generall Assembly on foot, with whom I had a joynt administration of astairs; so, that if there were any fault committed, it ought not to be imputed to me alone: But we held this Maxime: Not to treat with any but such as were able to make good our conclusions: For our former experience had taught us, that, such Curiosities had ruined our affairs; For while we fed our selves with hopes of peace, our enemies were not so active to prepare themselves for warre, but the spirits of our Party cooled as fast; so that such Treaties, were but inventions to betray us into a deadly security. Nor did such propositions ever proceed from any but our enemies; to which we answered, that we were alwayes ready to ask it with all submission and honour due to our King; that we only defired leave to fend to the King of Great Britain, without whom we could conclude nothing. And as for my part, I profess, that I had rather have endured all extremities, than violated so many religious Oathes I had taken, not to enter upon any Treaty without him. To which I add, that the hopes we had of considerable and speedy supplies from forraign Princes; the reiterated affirances of the King of Englaid; that he would never conclude a Peace, in which we were not included; and the great diversions the King then had, were, methinks, sufficient reasons, to withhold us from so unreasonable preffing for it.

There remains nothing more to be spoken, but concerning the Peace it self; in which we must reflect upon the King's, and our own condition, and how things were then carried; that we may the hetter judge, whether any thing could be better done. Our impleties obstructed our deliverance, which God only showed us, as he did the land of Casaan to the Children of 1/- r.ul, who dyed in the Desert. But if we reform our selves, he will, as he did for them, reserve it for our posterity.

He suffered the King to conquer, as soon as he came and saw: For to force the narron passinges of the Mountains, to take the Towne of Susa, and revictual Cazal, and make a peace with the King of Spaine, and the Duke of Savoy, were but one and the same action: This expedition over, and the peace with Eagland made, he turned his whole power against us. The Country about Montauban was ravished by Monssieur the Prince, and the Duke d' Esparato; that about Castres by Monsieur the Duke de Venadour; that about Milland by Monssieur de Noiailles; that about Nismes by Monsieur the Mareschall d' Estrée; And the King in person came also with his victorious Army, which he re-inforced with that of the Duke de Montmerium.

Thus were we at the same time, environed with fix Armies, confishing of more than fifty thousand Men, with a train of fifty piece of Canon, with Ammunition for fifty thousand shot, and other provision sufficient for the nourithment of the Souldiery. 'Twas then that the Partisans the King had in our Townes, began to show themselves, making overtures of particular Treaties to defeat a general Peace. Every one of those wasted Communalties, except Nismes and Montauban, required my presence with an Army; or threatned me with a particular accommodation. By the treachery of the Sieur de Chevrilles, was the Sieur St. Andre de Montbrune, with eight hundred Men of Languedoc, tog. ther with the Town of Privas loft. The Sieur de Le mvoir, having made his own composition, turned Broker for St. Ambroise; and all the Souldiers I had put in there, went thence Oratours to perswade others to the like cowardize and baseness. In all Languedoc, and the Sevenes could I not find a man would undertake the Command of Alex, to endure a Siege there; nor yet in Alduze, unlesse I shut my self up with them. Divers Communalties had formed their Assemblies before my face, and in spight of me, to make their own Peace apart; To dissolve which, I was enforced to call a Provincial Assembly, and promise them, that, if that proved ineffectual to procure a general Peace, they shou'd then be at liberty to make their own conditions. All the most eminent of our Party, a few only excepted, upon every flight occasion pick quarrels either among themselves, or with me; and many of them treated by themselves; for, none thought of saving anything but his own goods from this miferable wrack. In short, there was none that had any consideration of the Publique Interest. I should have been then glad to have seen, any of these Sub-Crivels, who living at their ease, and out of all danger, so freely bestow their Censures upon others: I believe that in such an extremity, they would have such no less perplexities than I then fuffered.

But this is not all; I saw that a general Peace was inevitably necessary, but found it obstructed by many and great difficulties. The King's Councill very well knew our condition, and were extreamly defirous to proceed in their defign; encouraged thereunto by our false Brethren, who daily made them new Proposals, tending to our destruction: and, had not I prevented the execution of the Town of Sauve's resolution, we had never obtained a general Peace. On the other fide, shough not one Communalcy, would put themselves in a posture of defence, it being impossible to incline them to disburse one newer, towards the railing of any Souldiers, or drawing any to those places where we feared a fiege; Yet, by the instigation of some inconsiderable, but seditions persons, bribed to diffurbe and embroyle us, did they murmure, when there was any Deech of throwing off but one stone from their Fortisications.

To remove these difficulties, I let the Court know, that I was refolved with the most of our Party, to dye blavely, rather than fail of a general Peace. That it was dangerous to leave an armed people no other hope of fafety than in death; that I would never treat alone; but, that if they would grant me respite but for four dayes with a ceffation for that time, and safe conduct to bring the Generall Assimbly from Nifmes, to Anduze, I durst promife my felf a happy conclusion: which was at length, but not without much hefitation: accorded me When the Generall Affemily were there arrived, they would not charge themselves alone with the whole burthen of the Treaty, especially at such a time, when it was impossible to obtain a Peace any way correspondent to their desires, and whence the reproaches they were to fear, so farre exceeded any thanks they could hope for; But defires the affistance of the Provincial Assembly of the Sevenes, and also of that of the Town of Anduze, as being most threatned with a Siege, and most concerned in the sublistence of the Fortifications. All conclude that a general Peace was necessary; and that they ought not to insist on any thing, but the qualification of the Article concerning the Fortifications. But the Gourd Affimbly not satisfied with this, affociated to whemse'ves twelve other Deputies extraordinary: fix from Nismes. and fix from ufez, fent purposely to endeavour the preservation -of the Fortifications and as many more also from the Assembly of the Sevenes: So that the Affembly confifted then of five and . fourty, or fifty persons: who unanimously sent their Deputies to the Court; where they had audience, were received to treat, and many Articles were agreed on; but, as concerning that of the Fortifications, no mention of any modification could be fuffered; fo that our Deputies returned without concluding any thing, and made their report to the Affembly; who thereupon fent to those of the Seveness for their advice. The Town of Anduze first vote a peace, with the losse of their Fortifications, next the Provincials, and last of all the Alembly Generall do the Like also, and returned their Deputies to conclude it; charging them moreover to infift upon some facisfaction to be made to me, in lieu of the loffs thad fulfained. Thus did we obtain a general Peace; and for my particular, they produced me a promife of an hundred thousand Crowns: out of which I affigned more than four score thousand Crowns, to such as had either ferved the Party, or disparted any fumnes to vards the payment of the Solldiery; fo, that there remains not to my portion twenty thousand Crowns to repair my ruinated Houses.

And now I shall submit it to the judgement of all Prudent, and Equitable persons, whether was the occasion of the first War? Whether the second vere prejudicial to those of our Religion? Whether I procured the third? Whether that being solicited by the King of England, to such an engagement, I ought to have refused it? Whether that being obliged not to hearken to any Treaty but conjoyatly with him, I ought to draw upon my self the guilt of perjury? And, whether after the peace was made between England and France, when I was beste of all hands, I should rather suffer the Extinctions of our Edicts, than preserve them by a General Peace; though with the lose of our Fortisi-cations, which we were no wayes able to defend.

These are the Crimes layd to my charge by our Pacifiques, and for which I have been condemned of thousands to be torn with wild-Horses, (which I esteem a glory to me, since they before also presumed to sentence Henry the Great, and Harquebusserd him in Estigate). I shall wish that those that shall succeed me have no lesse zeal, sheldly and patience, than I have had; that they may meet with a people more constant, lesse various, and more zealous than I have done; and that God would Crown their endeavours with more prosperous Events; that at length, restoring the Desolate Churches of France, they may happly accomplish what I have attempted. Amen.

Disa

Discourse X.

Monsieur the Prince his Letter to Monsieur the Duke of Rohan.

Monsieur,

The express pleasure of the King, to indulge those of the pretended reformed Religion, with a full liberty of Confcience, hath made me hitherto allow it to all, refiding in our Garrisons, Country, and Catholique Townes, that have contained themselves within the limits of their obedience due to his Majesty. Justice hath had its free course: Your Sermons are continued in all places, two or three only excepted, where they were used, not as exercises of Religion, but as Trumpets to Rebellion. The Officers that marched out of the Townes in Rebellion against him, still keep their Offices: In a word, those of the pretended Reformed Religion, that violate not their Loyalty, are treated equally with the Catholiques that have been still faithfull to the King. The discreeter fort of your Religion, have curfed your Rebellion, and at length found that the King hath done, nor you, nor them any harm, but what you have drawn upon your felves, the Malediction of God, and your Soveraigns just indignation against you. By the Letter you wrote to the Sieur Edmond, I have learned the resolution of the Assembly at Andrag. Whether will the rage for yourdiscovered juglings, and your foolish animosities against the Catholiques hurry you? Those that were taken at Gallargues were hanged by your own Decree; Since that you preferred Aymarques before their lives: Their destruction is just syable, by all the Rules of War, even between two Soveraigns: But in this case, between a servant and his Master, between a subject, as you are, and his King, and Soveraign; the threats you breath both against the Prisoners, which are of a different Nature from yours, and the Catholiques remaining in the Townes now in Rebellion, Rebellion, will fall upon your felves: You blow against the wind; you and your followers, will foon, or late, receive an exemplary punishment for it. For my part, I freely declare, I shall not fail to dispose of the Prisoners taken at Gallargues, according, as with good reason, I intended; and, (besides Savigane, and thirty others with him in Thouloufe,), all the Prifoners of Traquet, and Montpellier, and all others that are already, or for the future shall be taken, shall undergo the same pains, you inflict on those you now detain; and all the Huguenots in the Kingdom, the Ministers and Officers not excepted, shall be payed in the same Coyn, the Catholiques under your power are; And of this be most confident. And now that Rochelle is at the last gas; and that the English, discovering your fallacies, have deserted you, let it suffice you, to have added to your former Rebellions, three most notorious Crimes : The first is, the calling in of Forraigners into the Realm, and boasting of it publiquely in your writings. The second is, the creating Officers of Justice. The third is, Your coyning of mony with the Royal stamps: proper only to the King himself. Monsieur the Duke of Rohan's answer to Monsieur the Prince.

My Lord,

A Syour quality of Prince of the Blood gives you a Priviledge to write what you please to me; so doth it debar me of the liberty to answer you with that freedom I should otherwise use. It shall therefore suifice me, that I justifie my felf against your principal Accusations. I confess that I once unhandsomly took up Armes, it being not for any interests of our Religion, but of your person only, who promised us a reparation for the violations of our Edicts; yet did nothing at all in it, but shuffled up a Peace, before we could hear from the General Assimbly. Since that time, every one knows, I never had any recourse to Armes, but when obliged by pure necessity, to defend our Estates, our Lives, and the Liberty of our Consci-If the English came to our assistance, they had much more reason for it than the Germanes you drew into France; for that, by the King's con ent, they were both Mediatours, and Caution for the observance of our Peace; If we have coyned money, it was with the King's stamp, as it hath been usual in all our civil Warres. I understand my self too well, to pretend to be a Soveraign; nor had I ever my Nativity calculated, to know if I should ever arrive at that height: I confesse, I am held-in execuation among those who seek the ruine of the Church of God, and glory in it: As for your threatnings, they move me not: I am iefolved for all events. I feek my repole in Heaven; and God will vouchfafe me the Grace to enjoy the quiet of my Conscience upon Earth. You put to death the prisoners taken at Gallargues; I followed your example, doing the like to those I took at Mosts, I conceive this practice, will be more prejudicial to yours, than our men; for as much as being uncertain tain of their Salvation, death must needs be more terrible to You taught me to begin an exercise contrary to my own disposition. And yet, I should conceive my feet too cruel to my Souldiers, not to immolate some victimes to them. As for the maffacres you threaten those of the Religion with, who, under the Protection of the publique Faith, are now among you; It is a fair encouragement to make them trust their enemies, and a just vindication of our lawfull defence : I hope also that the King will one day know I have done him no differvice, and will forget his displeasure. You tell me, God will curse me: I confeffe I am a great finner, for which I do ferioufly repent me: but, fince the ancient Prophefies are fulfilled, and that I give no credit to those of our times, I do not fear that fire from Heaven shall consume me. In a word, I do not think you bestow these imprecations on me in good earnest, but only to purchase you a great esteem among the Papists; For, as 'tis reported, you have done well enough in this War, which gives me an affurance that you will let us alone in the poor Sevenes, fince there are more knockes than Piftols to be received. There remaines nothing for conclusion, but to pray God that he deal not with you after your works; but, that bringing you yet back again to the true Religion, he will give you constancy to persevere in it to the end: that imitating the examples of your Father and Grandfather; you may prove at length the Defender of our Church; then shall I subscribe that to your person, which I now do to your quality; that I am

DISCOURSE XII.

The Duke of Rohan's Manifesto upon the late Occurrences in the Country of the Grisons, and the Valteline.

He true Causes of the Insurrectious of the Grisons, would The true Causes of the Induction of the better concealed than published; and it much troubles be better concealed than published; But the Calumnies. me, that I am obliged to discover them : But the Calumnies . which people unpunished, are daily suffered to print against me. and the care taken to descry me both within, and without the Kingdom, constrain me, for the vindication of my honour (which I esteem dearer than my life) to speak the truth, as much, at least, as convenience will give way to: For, there are some things which I cannot resolve to touch, but imperfectly; though I have just reason to present them in their own true Shapes. The King at the Treaty of Hierafeo, obtained a demolition of the Forts built by the Imperialists in the Country of the Grisons, who were also to be re-stablished in the Valteline, as they were before the beginning of the Rebellion. I was then at Venice, where when I thought of nothing, but spending the rest of my dayes in quiet: I was commanded by the King into the Country of the Grifons, to put that defign in execution: I prefently obeyed, and transported my felf into those parts; where I found, that by the King's Order there was a Levy made of three thousand Men: and that they had begun the Fortifications of the Bridge over the Rhine; which I continued with as much care, and diligence, as the money allotted for it would give way. When I had thus spent a whole year, I was commanded to reduce the Troops to a thoufand Men, and to return again to Venice; which I did to the great diffatisfaction of the Gr fors, who were much discontented to see themselves frustrated of their hopes of being restored to the Valteliae, and in arreares great fummes of money for four moneths pay. Not long after I received a new Command to return to the

on the Occurences in the Country of the Grisons . 61

the Grisons, to observe the Actions of the Duke of Feria, that he leized not on it, as he marched with his Army into Germany. After that Army had passed the Valteline, I had fix several Orders to enter it, which were as many times revoked: at length, I received other Orders to go to Pairs, where I was commanded to go to Alface, and thence to the Grifons, to execute the defign upon the Valteline, in April, in the year 1635. I happily passed through Switzerland, and feized on the Valtetine, which I defended in four fet Battels, in which the Emperour, and the King of Spains Armies, sent thither to rive me thence, were defeated. I used all necessary means to secure all the Valteline, and the County of Pornio and Chiazennes: all which was approved by his Majesty. Then was I instantly urged by the Gissons for their re-stabl.shment in the Valteliae, according to the many Royal promifes made them both by word of mouth, and in writing. But having no order to do it; and being no longer able to delay them with excutes, I fent Intelligence of all to the Court; proposing alfo an Accomodation, which, though full of difficulty, I doubted not to effect; I had Orders to attempt it; which I did, and so pursued it; that at length I procured a Treaty; with the Ratification of the Grisons, and the Consent of the Vallelines; by which I obtained all that was defired, and indeed more than was hoped for, But instead of his Majesties Confirmation, were sent me Modifications, and exceptions which ruined all.

While the Grisons expected the effect of the Treaty, divers accidents happened in the Country: to wit, want of money to pay the Grison Troops: the Pestilence, which destroyed the French Army; and a violent sicknesse which surprized me. All which encouraged those that were desirous of Innovations, and alienated from us the Grison Colonels and Captains, who were before well affected to France; who sirst presented me with a Petition; next sent me a Declaration by their Deputies; and at last resolved to quit their Ports, and the service, unlesse they received fome pay.

In the mean while, the Imperial Partifans, lost no opportunity to revive those Conspiracies, which the Victorious progress of the King's Army in the Valteline, had well near suppressed; and so farre did they proceed, that there was no small probability that we should then see that insurrection which ensued afterwards. I then kept my bed, having scarce recovered my speech, and consequently was in no fit condition to remedy such distermers: All that I could do, was to desire Monsteur Lasnier the Embassadour, to take a journey to Goire, which he did, but sound the Party in such a posture, that he could by no meanes break off the correspondency between the Colonel's and Captains, with the chief of the League, who promises them to leave their posts, and retire to the middle of their Country, and there continue in a body. As soon as a bad notice of this disorder, I commanded a Sedim to be prepared, in which a was carried to Coire; where I caused a General council to be held, for the reducing of these people. I was then of opinion to conceal the Modification sent me from the Court, which Modification for the Modification was sent to the Commons, which so exasperated them, that they held another Council at Illaus, where they privately resolved upon the Deputation to Impruchts to treat with the Imperial sts, and Span ards.

Notwithstanding all this, I came to a Composition with the Grison Colonels and Captains, concerning their pay: upon which Condition, and after the payment of the first summe agreed upon between us, they were to return to the service. But all the Rcmonstrances I could make during these stirres, were not prevalent enough to procure the fecond payment for those Colonels and Captains, nor any pay for the Switzers, nor money to furnish the French Souldiers with bread: fo that I was left alone, to struggle all at once with the discontents of the three Nations. In the mean time their Deputies concluded their Treaty at Impruchts, and obtained of the King of Spain, the payment of their Troops from the first of November, 1636 the re-stablishment of the Jurisdiction of the Valteline, exercised by the Grisons, without any distinction of Religion; and other Articles farre more advantageous, than those we had accorded them. As foon as I had discovered this agreement, I gave notice of it to the Court, by an express of the 27th, af December in the same year, in these very terms: That the King must resolve to accept of honourable Conditions to leave the Grifons, and withdraw his Troops, or to give Order for their speedy satisfactions, it being past the power of any Promises, or Treaties, longer to prevent the eruption of their discontents, into an open flame; And, at the bottom of my Letter, I conjured Monsieur Bouteiller earnestly to press the consideration of it there, where it was of greatest concernment. But all this produced no effect. In the mean while the Deputies returned from Impruchts; Whereupon, I wrote again more earnestly than ever; still hoping, If I could yet obtain any necessary supplyes of money, to effect two things infallibly; One was to reclaim a good part of those who had deserted us: being well assured, that despair, and the ruin of their domestique affairs were the only motives that engaged upon the Occurances in Grisons and Valteline 63

them in the contrary Party: The other, which I had also compassed, had I been assisted with money, was, to have retarded the rifing: For, in fuch matters, he that gains time winnes all, and delay is the greatest enemy to all Conspiracies. This was the only reason that hindered my departure towards the Valteline; For having determined to ftop me, the fame day that I should be in a readinelle to go from coire; it had been a great imprudence in me to occasion the cruption of a businesse which time alone could prevent: But these considerations were of no validity. For, fo farte were they from furnishing me with the neces. far es I demanded, that to compleat our mischiefs, my Messenger returned without an answer; so that being now void of all hopes, I had no other confolation to alleviate these extream perplexities: but to protest before God and Men, against those that had occasioned the ruin of the affairs of that Country; which I did by an express, addressed to Monsieur de Noiers. Whereupon, seeing that I was now destitute of all hopes of assistance, and that my Letters were not youchfafed an answer; there was nothing more lett for me to do, than with impatience to expect the approach of the tempest, which I had long before forefeen.

At length came the storm, of which I was as certain four moneths before, as the very day it fell. I confesse indeed, that to avoid the sight of so unpleasing a Speciacle, I had desired leave to go to Vinice, to take order for my assains there; which was granted me upon condition, that I should be responsible for all accidents in the Country of the Gr sons, during my absence, but not one word of answer was returned, concerning the means I demanded to prevent the evils; foresaw. The whole Country then being in one day risen in Armes against me; all that I could do was to retire to the fort upon the Rhine, and there to sendezvous the Colonel Schmit's Regiment of Smitzers, consisting of 800 men, with the 200 French which were there because he forced to draw off the Guards from the Bridge over the Rhine, and from Steich, for that I had not men enough to keep those postes too.

There was I besieged by six Grison Regiments, which, with the Spanish money they had compleated, out of the Communalities of the Grison League, out of the Neighbour Communalities of Core, out of that of Tans, of the Valley of Pertaus, and the Troops of Galas, who were now drawn down to the Grison Frontieres, I heard not any thing from the Army in the Valteline, nor could I send to them at all, being inclosed in a Fort, where there was but one Mill, which could scarce grind Corn enough enough for two hundred Men, and generally fo ill provided of all necessaries, that it is a shame to speak it: For it was impossible, notwithstanding all the most instant sollicitations made to that end, ever to obtain any settled stores for the subsistance of rhe said Fort.

Besides these exigencies, all communication with the Valtetine was cut off, nor could I long continue my correspondencies in Switzerland; For the Grisons kept the Bridge over the Rhine, which was fordeable but fifteen dayes: In which time I took the opportunity to fend Monsteur de Meboud Embaffadour to Switz rland, a true state of my condition, that he might give both the King and Monsieur de Thullerie, Embassadour of Venice, an account of it. I writ also to the Cartor of Zurich, to try, if I could thence in some short time obtain a thousand or twelve hundred Smitzers, with which I would have attempted to keep the Field: But Zurich conceiving the proposition too full of hazard to be undertaken by them alone, there being an Affembly Generall ready to fit at B.iden, thought it sufficient to advertise their Neighbours of these late accidents, And that Canton, with that of Claris, sent Deputies to mediate an accommodation between the Grisons, and me : to which end a Conference was held: The Grifuns demand the Valteline, so often promised them, and a Million of Livers due for their Colonels and Captains for their Arrears: And moreover declare, that, having called in the King's Forces only to defend them against their Neighbours, they had no more need of their affistance, since they were now come to an agreement with them; and that, in a word, they defired without any further delay, they might be put in possession of that, which did of right belong unto them; that, fince the King had fome reasons which impeded their re-stablishment in that manner as they defired, they had now found means to effect it another way, with which they were very well contented; and fatisfied; and, that if all these considerations were laied aside, yet was there one more equivalent to them all; to wit, that they defired not that the King's Forces should make any longer abode in their Country, and that it was a thing never before heard of, forcibly to impose relief on those that defired not, nor had any need of their affistance; That Soveraigns give Lawes in their own Territories, and do not receive them from any other; That, as they should ever acknowledge themselves infinitely obliged to his Majesty for the assistance he had youchfafed them, so did it seem hard to them, that he should continue his Armies in their Country against their will : To which

on the Occurences in the Country of the Grisons. 6 ;

which I replyed, that the King would easily condescend to any reasonable propositions, if t cy were demanded as they ought; and that, if they would give me time to send to the Court, I would assure them, they should receive all possible satisfaction.

The Deputies of Zuruh, and Claris omitted nothing to incline them to more friendly terms, at least, till the Session of the Assimbly at baden; but whether, that they feared the disbanding of their new raised Souldiers, or whether it was by reason of their nearness to the Imperialists, and Spanish Forces, who desired nothing more, than to set footing in their Country, they would not listen to sany Composition, unlesse I would engage to give them up the Fort upon the Rhine; which the Switzers Deputies also fearing the kindling of a fire so near their own Houses, perswaded me to resign.

This was my Condition, and that which is most considerable is, that the Switzers were Masters of the Fort, who cryed also, that they never understood that the King's Forces came into the Grisons Country for any other end, than to aid them, as Allyes of the Crown; that his Majesty was too just to have any other thoughts; that if it should appear to them that he intended any thing, so contrary to the right of Nations, as to continue his Troops in a Consederates Country, by force, they should then consider what they had to do: That since the Grisons declared, that they had no more need of the King's Succours, they could no longer remain there, without contracting on the French Nation the eternal blemish of an unjust usurgation: And as for their particular, they could do no less than withdraw their Souldiers, that they might not draw upon themselves the guilt of being accessories to a thing of so ill resentment.

I had no time given me to deliberate hereupon; for, when I thought to have kept it twelve or fifteen dayes, which was all I could do; I was perpetually urged to be gone: Wherefore, I took this following course; to wit, to leave the Fort in the Smitzers hands (who were indeed Masters of it before) and accept of a certain term to withdraw the French Troops from the Valteline, by which I got time also to inform his Majesty of it, which I could not any other way obtain of the Gruons. This was all could be done in such an exigent as I was in, all other courses being absolutely destructive; For, besides that the Fott was not in my power, the Smitzers being absolute Masters of it: it was, as I have before related, utterly unprovided of necessaries, nor could be relieved but by the way of Smitzers land, or the Army in the Valteline. As for Smitzersland, it was impossible impossible to be done that way: First, by reason of the aversion the Cantons had declared to the design; and next, for that it could not be effected, without forcing the Grisons, who kept the Bridge over the Rhine. As for the Valteline, it is most certain, that no relief could come thence, it being a thing I could not order, for that it was not in my power, for as much as all communication with that Army was entirely cut off. But, that this might have been done, it had been requisite that the Valteline Army should have been then commanded by a Man able of himfelf to attempt such a thing, without expecting Orders from one, who, as is well known, was not in a capacity to fend them: For the Forts in the Valteline, and County of Chiavennes, being furnithed for two moneths, he might have marched to my affiftance with eight thousand Foot, and seven hundred Horse, which had been sufficient to reduce the Grisons, and to hinder the Entry of the Germanes into that Country. This was the only errour committed in this Affair; As for my particular, I value not the vulgars descant on my actions; having as much satisfaction within iny self, as a punctual and exact obedience to all the Commands imposed on me, can give; having not drawn off my Troops, nor delivered up the Valteline to the Grisons, untill I had received his Majesties Commission for it: It is true, that before I had it, I began to treat, but upon fuch terms, that I had time enough to know the King's pleasure, before I came to any conclusion.

If fince that time any other expedients to repair that Affair, were thought on, they came so late, that Monsteur d' Estampes, and Monsteur de Guebriant, who were then present, found it impossible to put them in execution: which I could more clearly demonstrate; did not my duty oblige me to conceal things of that nature, which even good manners will never give me leave to reveal.

DISCOURSE AIII,

A Letter to Monsieur the Prince of Condé.

Monsieur,

Had never taken the liberty to answer those unhandsome Characters, you would have fixed upon me in the Assembly of Guienne, in November last, could I imagine you had no other design, than to exempt your self from the dishonour, the King's Armes, and the Reputation of the French Nation, received under your Command before Fontarabie; and should gladly have preferred the respect due to your quality before my own Justification; had you not also engaged that which I owe, my blood, and to asperse me, evidenced how willingly you could descend from your Quality of Prince of the Blood, to play the scurvy Oratour, as if you better knew how to use your Tongue, and Pen, than your Sword. The greatest Crime I am charged with in your Writing, was, that I refused to obey you, which you yet pretend, not confidering, that fuch a contempt of your Command, would more reflect upon your felf than me, if that fair opportunity of taking Fontarabie had been lost upon that occasion, since you had then the power in your hand to pun'sh me for my disobedience. Pardon me, Sir, if I tell you, that you palliate with my pretended obstinacy, the favour you were willing to gratifie the Arch-Bishop of Bourdeaux with, to my prejudice, and, that they were your own inventions which made you change, and re change the Councils after the two first affaults I had given, and at length lose your opportunity, to which you impute the affront, as is well known to the whole Army, to deprive me of the fruit of my labours, and snatch the Lawrell out of my hands: But, how can that conduce to the defeat received three dayes after, or with what colour can that be laid to my charge; fince you presently took me from my Post,

68 A Letter to Monsieur the Prince of Condé.

saying, it would be better managed by another, and that one boures smart assult would make you Master of the place. I Suppose, in this you condemn your felt, unless you please to fay, also that I tyed your tongue and hands : 10, that the one could not command, what the others were unable to execute; and that vourwere much better feek fome more specious pretext to oppressine, than to produce such accusations against me, as only betray your or n guilt. It were another matter, it yet imputing the miscarriages to me, you think it sufficient for my conviction, to fay, that I faw the diforder, and stirred nor to and you; to this I can justly reply, that, if there were any thing of fortune, or honour to be faved after the wrack, it was I that preferved it, and was also the occasion, that the blood of the whole Army was not shamefully spilt, and that the loss was not greater than the dishonour: You never did me the honour to impart any of your refolutions to my knowledge; nor could I have everthought, that, to hinder the Enemies forcing your Trenches, you would have removed to draw your Army into Battailla two leagues thence, or that you had need of the Body I commanded; fince you never gave me notice of it; It is true, I heard of the diffurbance, and diforder in your Camp by the first that fled, who came to my Quarters, and in an instant had all my men in a readiness, expecting some generous Commands from you; in which expectation, I conceived you had rallyed again; and impatiently attended fome intelligence from vou; the first and most certain newes I could hear, was that of your imbarquing; which, I must confess surprized me with amazement, and that being not able to imagine how that, should be, I fought in your Wit, and Courage for those Reasons which I could not find in your misfortune; for that I could not suppose you were circumvented for want of providence; that if you were forced to give way to the greater power of your Enamles, I did conceive, that retreating to my Troops, which I till then believed you had kept as a Referve, we might tally the rest by your Presence, and turn again upon your Enemies. who had gotten fo cheap a Victory; on which I my felf had adventured, had I not by experience known, how great an influence the example of the Generall hath, either to raise or deject the spirits of the whole Body, and that your so sudden inbarquing had difficartned all our Souldiers; Nevertheleffe, all the reft of that day, and the night following, did I keep all that were under my Command in Armes: conjecturing that you would take up some noble Resolution in this Disaster. and apply such a remedy to it, as could not be expected from any

any but your felf: I drew not off at all untill I saw my felf absolutely frustrated of my hopes, and then retreated in such order, as that the Enemy durit not make any attempt upon me; And, 'tis in this particular alone, that I can acknowledge any just cause you have to complain of me, since I usurped the honour which was due to you; My respect shall incline me to fuffer all else your passion shall speak against me; and, I am very forry, that for your entire satisfaction you should be enforced to fay, that I have been much suspected in many other remontres, but that I have not alwayes behaved my felf so ill: I would not, it should be known what I contributed to your passage into Sp.un, which progress you extoll so high, to make the ruines of it fall more impetuously upon me; and could wish you had been more referred in that acculation, for that the multitude you bring to convince me in that particular, makes the world impute the whole guilt to you: It had been enough that you had Justified your felf in a publique Assembly, and after your fathion, given the King an account of my Comportments, without publishing and crying in the streets of Paris, your triumph over me at Fortarable. It would have been looked on, as a Procedure much more befeeming your Quality, had you left the thing wholly to his Majesties consideration, who alone was concerned to abfolve, or punish me, if I had offended, and not made your felt a Sollicitour, Judge, Party, and Suborner of Witnesses, against an Innocent and absent person, whom your Tyranny only forced to leave the Kingdom.

But what have my Father and my Brothers done to be involved with me in your Invectives, unless perhaps you desire to condemn them for fear they should Justifie me, or that you think your fill not sufficiently cleared, unless you raze, and pluck up the very Foundations of our House: Pardon me, Sir, if I tell you that the honour my Father hath had, to be raised, esteemed, and carested by Kings themselves: the Service he hath done the State, and his Age, might have made you spare him for your own sake; since you hate him only for mine; and that, as during his whole life he hath professed himself to be, a Just, and Generous Person, who never betrayed his Friends, nor knew how to statter his Enemies: he hath still so demeaned himself, that he hath never directly slighted or offended the Parliaments, as you infinuate: nor yet been guilty of so much folly and want of reason, as to stand in need of so poor supports, as flattery to uphold his Quality.

Nor are my Brothers any more guilty of my Crimes than my Father; nor can I imagine why you should seek to make them which you will not discover; But after all these things, Sir, I am sorry you should alleadge past-actions, as reasons to persuade the people of the verity of your present Objections against me; and that you should upbraid me with the Battel of Espellete, unless for sear they should reproach you that of Bole; and, that you charge my Father with seditions, which are Crimes, as you say, least pardonable in all States, less they should call to mind the troubles raised by you in the King's Minority; during which time, we may safely say, that you taught the Nobility Faction, and the yet bleeding people Rebellion; which you never gave off, untill the Bois de Vincennes, took away both your Reputation, and the use of it.

I know not, Sir, with what Eye you will regard this my just Defence; but I trust in your goodness, that when you come to your self again, you will not take it amiss, that a worm of the Earth should turn against him that goes to crush him; and hope, that those, who have stirred you up to persecute me, will one day more justly bear the penalty of your Indignation than my felf.
